

A CRITICAL INVESTIGATION OF THE OPPOSITION OF THE RĪFĪ CONFEDERATION LED BY MUḤAMMAD BIN 'ABD AL-KARĪM
AL-KHAṬṬĀBĪ TO SPANISH COLONIAL EXPANSION IN NORTHERN MOROCCO
1920-1925, AND ITS POLITICAL AND SOCIAL BACKGROUND

Volume II

Charles Edmund Richard Pennell

Submitted in fulfilment of the requirements for the Degree of Doctor of Philosophy

University of Leeds

Department of Semitic Studies

November, 1979

Chapter IX

THE ORGANISATION OF THE RĪFĪ STATE

The text of the bay'a of Muḥammad bin 'Abd al-Karīm read as follows:

"Praise be to God alone. May God's blessing be upon our Lord Muḥammad, his family and companions. Praise be to God who has set up the Caliphate to unite the religion and the world, who has raised its power above all other, so that it is of the highest rank, who has raised its sun above all things, illuminating all things with its light. He has made a friendship between the hearts of his servants, between those who are close to each other and those separated by a great distance. He has made the Caliphate a rampart against [the spilling of] blood, [protecting men's] fortunes and [safeguarding] against the accidents of fate. With the Caliphate He has bound the hands of tyrants, so that they may not achieve that evil which they intend. Through the Caliphate He has brought about morality and righteousness. Laws and limits and principles have been established. He has raised the minaret of the Caliphate as a banner by which [men] may be guided, calling them to the truth. In its long shadow both the powerful and the weak, the lowly and the high-born, seek refuge.

Praise be to Him who decides, and guides mankind. Man does not ask [for sustenance] in vain. But He has ordered [man] to do some things and has forbidden him others. He has warned mankind against following his desires and He has set upon him the performance of religious duties and good works. He is the most wise of the wise.

If it were not for some men who fought others, so that the world was degraded . . . [text unclear]. But God is possessed of mercy towards the inhabitants of the world, and through his mercy, kings (al-mulūk) have been set up, and He has shown roads along which men may travel and a conduct which they must follow. Otherwise man would sink into anarchy, some would devour others and the people of order would fall into factionalism and anarchy. If it were not for the Caliphate the roads would not be safe for us, the strong would prey upon the weak. . . . [illegible].

Praise be to God for him who was sent as a sign of God's complete mercy, the origin and foundation of all things, the height and greatest extent of perfection, the most holy of the saints, the leader of the pure, and for the family of him who has universal glory and the greatest power [i.e., the Prophet] and his Righteous Companions and the rightly-guided leaders, who set up the principles of the faith and arranged its foundations for those who would build upon it. They told what he [i.e., Muḥammad] had done basing [the ḥadīths] on his authority, God's mercy and peace be upon him. He said: 'God has conferred this distinction upon a Qurashī, and God has settled on him, and God has bestowed his power on the man he wishes from amongst us.'

[The Prophet] said: 'A man who dies and has not made a bay'a, has died in ignorance.'

According to the Ṣaḥīḥ of Muslim he said, God's mercy and peace be upon him:

'He who wishes to break up the nature of this community, when it is one, cut off his head with a sword, whoever he may be.'

According to the Ṣaḥīḥ of Muslim, he said, God's mercy and peace be upon him:

'If a man comes to you, when you are all agreed on one man [as amīr] and he tries to break up your community, kill him.'

In the Ṣaḥīḥ of al-Bukhārī it is said, on the authority of ibn 'Abbās--may God be pleased with him--that the Prophet of God, God's mercy and peace be upon him, said:

'If a man dislikes anything that his amīr does, let him bear it in patience, for he who removes himself from the authority [of the Sultan] by even an inch will die the death of an ignorant man.'

Also in [the Ṣaḥīḥ of al-Bukhārī] it is reported on the authority of Abū Hurayra, may God be pleased with him, that the Prophet of God, God's mercy and peace be upon him, said: 'He who obeys me, obeys God, and he who disobeys me, disobeys God, and he who obeys my amīr, obeys me, and he who disobeys my amīr, disobeys me.'

The Commander of the Faithful, 'Umar bin al-Khaṭṭāb, may God be pleased with him, said to ibn 'Uqba: 'Perhaps after today you will see [lit., meet] me no more. You must be strong in faith in God, may He be exalted, and listen to and obey the amīr, be he a slave or an Abyssinian.'

The [first] community [of Islam] swore together that a single imām should be appointed over the Muslims, for it is one of the precepts of suitability in the eyes of God . . . [illegible] just as the organisation of the Caliphate is an obligation pointed out by the texts of the ḥadīths and the verses [of the Qur'ān].

The poet said: 'It is not good that the people should live in anarchy with no authority over them, and there is no authority if the ignorant among them have control.'

Thus the tribes of the Rif and the tribes of the Jibāla, before the [events of the past] two years, lived in [a state of] extreme ferocity and disgrace, in great ignorance and tyranny and obduracy, and lived far apart from the rules of law (sharī'a), and crime grew among the believers to such an extent that resistance to him who held authority in the country became general, and they continued [to live] in factionalism, to kill and to rob people's goods. At the same time they had [to face] what the enemy [i.e., the Spanish] brought in the way of sedition and terror so that they had no place of refuge or even of habitation, except what they could bring about through great cooperation. And, when all this exhausted them and they knew no remedy, they sought someone who would take over their leadership, [a man] commissioned by them, and they came together to consider, and they entrusted their business, in its importance, both in heaven and on earth, to Him who is most praiseworthy in His deeds in all the length and breadth of the earth. A man responded to their wishes and took over their affairs and he ordered them first of all to follow the law (sharī'a) of the Prophet through which every expectation is achieved, after he had made them swear on the Holy Book (al-maṣḥaf) to keep their covenants and promises. He set up over them and then he organised them and he taught them the methods of war and defence of the fatherland (waṭan) and the way to attack the servants of the cross and [worshippers] of idols [i.e., the Christian Spanish]. They seized the opportunity of attacking their enemy at once. At once they came on him, victorious, caring nothing for the strange [methods?--illegible] which the Spaniards brought against them, neither were they stopped by their unfamiliar fortifications. And they went at once and became united Praise be to Him who has destroyed them [i.e., the Spanish] for in His power he has every matter always [text very unclear here]. By following this their amīr, may God help him, they found happiness and by following his excellent orders they started [on the road] towards complete victory, and they achieved their ultimate [ends] in organising their country. And this is known both far and near, and no human being would deny it. The man who scorns [this achievement] is scorning the light of day: for how could anything [be said to] be right in men's minds if the light of day is in need of proof?

. [illegible]

Then, when they had gained security, both for themselves and their possessions, they multiplied and progressed, [they rejoiced] in great peace and success and well-being in accordance with their dearest wishes, and so the disruption caused by murder and robbery and the other kinds of misfortune to which they had been accustomed in the past dwindled and faded. All the fires of revolt were put out and God dispelled their worries and spread out his mercy and removed their griefs, and their hearts became resolute where they had been miserable, and their faces smiling where they had been melancholy. And the evil and violence that came between them vanished and the standards of peace and well-being [came close]. God directed the armies of the Muslims to pleasing actions and inspired them to what is for the good of the world, and the faith and the soul, and the citizens.

Opinions concurred and the community joined together to proclaim him who has risen on the horizon of happiness whose full moon has appeared and risen in the heaven of knowledge. The man [in whose hands] the reins of the Imamate are joined, and the . . . to him have come the benefits of the Imamate [text unclear]. He is a man to whom the Caliphate came dragging its robe behind it, and he took it without wasting time. [The Caliphate] was appropriate only for him, and he was appropriate only for it. [He is a man] whom the hearts of all creatures were created to love, who has found a welcome throughout Islam because of his glory and great importance, the commander of the fighters for the faith. He is the man who puts his trust in God, the one singled out [for this task]. Our Lord Muḥammad, son of our learned and distinguished Lord 'Abd al-Karīm al-Khaṭṭābī al-Waryaghī al-Rifī. They have proclaimed him, may God fortify him and make him victorious, in accordance with the Qur'ān of God and the sunna of His Prophet [to] install justice which is the aim of all desires. A Proclamation (bay'a), a duty in which [all men's] hearts and tongues are bound, towards which all men's feet and heads strive, obediently and humbly, [promising] never to set aside their obedience towards him and never to deviate from the road of the community, by which we pledge allegiance to our Lord the Prophet of God, God's mercy and peace be upon him, and the rightly-guided caliphs after him and the rightly-guided imāms. They will keep their promise to hear and obey his commands. Their eyes have seen it, and they have borne witness to it through the purity both of their secret desires and their public actions, and they have given their hands [as a seal to the promises] upon it, and they have signed their names to it, owing it [i.e., the Caliphate] their allegiance both in private and in public, in what is encouraging and what is hateful, in what is easy and what is difficult. They have borne witness to themselves aware of their secret thoughts and cognisant of all that is hidden, saying:

We have given you our bay'a, and we have invested you with authority so that you may direct us with justice and kindness and in sincerity and that you should judge between us in truth just as God, may He be exalted, said to his Prophet: [illegible]

'Indeed we have created a Caliphate on earth, so judge between men with justice.'

He also said, may He be exalted, and His words are true: 'He who carries out what God has promised, him we shall reward greatly.'

He also said, may He be exalted: 'Be not used as an advocate by those who betray their trust.'

On this are agreed those who [bind] and loose, those who can speak on matters great and small, those who are characterised by knowledge and judgement, those who are allowed to reject and contract [lit. sign]. There was no argument between them [when they met] before any mosque, not from scribe nor legal expert [lit. possessors of the fatwa] who are asked and who reply, neither from those who persevere in their views--be they right or wrong--nor among those who are known for [their] religion and probity, no horsemen of war nor fighter, nor from men of responsibility in [affairs] or government, nor the a'yān, the noble sharīfs, nor the important faqīhs, nor from those of lesser power and position.

Those who were present witnessed this themselves in obedience. God be exalted, they did their duty by the law. God has made [the Caliphate] a mercy for creation, and through it He has set up on the earth justice and truth. He helps the man who meets [the Caliphate] with a welcome, with His aid and assistance, and with the success [He grants] and His guidance. Man is given life through the sunna, our Lord and Master, the Prophet, God's mercy, peace, glory and kindness be upon him.

Let our country be happy since its fetters have been cut away, let it [be given to] the man who undertakes its protection, who spares its blood, who suppresses its enemies, who defends it from destruction, makes the law triumphant, and who undertakes to build it.

May God make him triumphant, make him victorious. May he destroy heresies and errors through [this man], and the party of oppression and unbelief and depravity. May he make the Caliphate stay in this man's family until the day of resurrection.

Indeed, Oh our master, you are able to do this. You are indeed the Lord, the one who gives victory.

There is no power, no strength, except through God the high, the great. May the blessing and complete peace of God be on our Lord Muḥammad, his family and companions.

Finally we call out to praise God, Lord of the worlds.

On the day of the full moon 14 Jumāda II 1341."¹

¹ MAEF, Maroc 517, p. 180. Proclamation of Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Karīm, dated 14 Jumāda II 1341/2 Feb. 1923. The original is signed by a number of people of whom it is possible to distinguish the following names: Muḥammad b. 'Alī

With these words, Muḥammad bin 'Abd al-Karīm was formally invested as the Rifis' leader. This was his bay'a. This document is, of course, of vital importance in understanding the nature of the Rifī state, laying down as it does the political principles of the state, the need to maintain the sharī'a, and to defeat the Spanish, and giving the reasons why bin 'Abd al-Karīm was to be considered the most likely acceptable man to lead the Rif, and above all, throwing light on the nature of his leadership. Thus the bay'a of 2 February 1923 was the legitimisation of a new, fully independent state in the Rif, but one which, unlike traditional Berber chiefdoms, was based on an entirely new conception of the rôle of Islam in society, on the need for modern technique allied with religious reform.

The Bay'a

The bay'a of Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Karīm begins with direct references to the value of the institution of the Caliphate. It praises the Caliphate's advantages, promoting unity, order, morality, law, and its opposition to tyranny, and to factionalism. It emphasises the religious necessity of the Caliphate, the amīr, whoever he might be (and this of course is vitally important in the context of al-Ghumārī, al-Rifī, 'Alī b. al-Ḥājj Muḥammad al-Huzmārī, Bil-Qāsim b. 'Abd al-Qādir al-Fījījī al-Ḥassanī, Sha'ib b. al-Ḥājj 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Ya'qūbī, Muḥammad b. al-Ḥājj Salāḥ al-Ḥassanī, Sha'ib b. Mimūn b. 'Allāl al-Wazzānī al-Walshakī, Muḥammad b. al-Ḥājj Muḥammadīn al-Timsamānī. The French translator of this document (whose rather incomplete translation appears on pp. 181-186 of MAEF file 517) claims to distinguish also the names of Muḥammad b. al-Ḥassan al-Ḥassanī, al-Ḥājj Tāhir al-Ya'qūbī, Aḥmad b. al-Muqaddam al-Haskūshī and Muḥammad b. 'Amar al-Ta'bānī (from the Timsamān). This document is reproduced in the Appendix (No. 4).

of the Rīf, since bin 'Abd al-Karīm's claims to descent from 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb were, to say the least, dubious).¹ Thus the bay'a is talking about the necessity for a Caliphate.

Then the bay'a moves on to describe the anarchy, violence and disruption of Rīfī and Jibālī society which pertained before a man--who is not yet named --came to reorganise society and bring about order, and lead them to victory against the Christians. Now all was peaceful, and the "reins of the Imamate" were joined in this man's hands. The Caliphate had come to him "dragging its long robe behind it." Then the man is named as "Muḥammad . . . b. 'Abd al-Karīm al-Khaṭṭābī al-Waryaghī al-Rīfī". So this man, according to his bay'a was a Caliph, God's "shadow on earth", and he had been proclaimed, not because of his family connections, or his birth, but because of what he had already done to organise the Rīf according to the sharī'a and the necessities of war. It was, so to speak, a bay'a ex post facto, and in this very similar to those traditionally given to Moroccan Sultans in recognition of the authority that they already held. Like the Sultan's bay'as, the final part of this one is directed at what bin 'Abd al-Karīm was expected to do:

"We have given you our bay'a and we have invested you with authority so that you may direct us with justice and kindness"²

He is expected to protect his country, defeat its enemies, make the sharī'a triumphant, and destroy heretical doctrines (bid'a). These were similar to the expectations placed in

¹ See above, p. 147.

² MAEF, Maroc 517, p. 180, Proclamation of Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Karīm, dated 14 Jumāda II 1341/2 Feb. 1923.

Mūlāy 'Abd al-Ḥafīẓ in his bay'a from the 'ulamā' of Fez --the expulsion of the Christians, the reinforcement of Islamic practices, the establishment of a just rule of law.¹ The difference, of course, was that b. 'Abd al-Karīm already had carried out these aims, in part at least, so the bay'a was far more a confirmation of his authority than that given to 'Abd al-Ḥafīẓ, which was more in the way of being a plan for his future government.

This bay'a appears, therefore, to be a document which confirms the Caliphate upon bin 'Abd al-Karīm, giving him wide personal power. However, this contradicts what a number of other sources say were his intentions. Nationalist writers like 'Allāl al-Fāssī, for instance, denied that bin 'Abd al-Karīm proposed himself as a Sultan. Writing from a Royalist-Moroccan-nationalist standpoint, he stated:

"It is fortunate that this movement for liberation, like its predecessor [i.e., that surrounding Mūlāy 'Abd al-Ḥafīẓ] had a democratic orientation that aimed at improving the lot of the people, given the time in which it was happening, and at protecting the people's existence, and possessions. The foundation of the Republic [of the Rif] did not mark a deviation from a monarchist position in the thoughts of the leaders of the Rif, but in reality they were unable so speak in the name of the King of Morocco, whom force of circumstance had placed in the French zone. But they did not wish to fall into the error of al-Ḥiba and his father Mā' al-'Ainīn, who announced themselves to be kings when in the past they had been loyal to the throne [of Morocco] and had defended it. For this reason they found a compromise solution by setting up a temporary regime in which an administration could be organised and the people trained to govern themselves, and when the liberation of the rest of the country had been achieved, the liberated territory would be returned to the King."²

David Hart has agreed with this view, and has stated that bin 'Abd al-Karīm styled himself amīr al-mu'minīn and that "in no way did 'Abd al-Krim think of himself as Sultan: there was only one Sultan in Morocco, Mulay Yussif . . . even though he may have been regarded as a tool in the hands of the French."¹

¹ See above, p. 34, and Laroui, Origines, p. 396.

² Al-Fāssī, op. cit., p. 121.

There is indeed, primary evidence that bin 'Abd al-Karim, at least formally, rejected the role of Sultan. The proclamation of bin 'Abd al-Karim--be it as amir, President, Sultan, or whatever--was not a single event but a series of proclamations as different groups and tribes accepted his authority. The first proclamation of all had been in January 1923,² and the bay'a reproduced at the beginning of this chapter is only a later proclamation of another group, whose members were relatively obscure people from the eastern Rif.

The original bay'a of 18 January is not, however, preserved. But an account of the ceremony is given by Skiraj, who entitles it thus: "A description of the swearing of the bay'a of the Amir Muhammad bin 'Abd al-Karim, the agreement of the Muslims upon him, and the complete imposition of his command."³ (Certainly the phrase "complete imposition of his command" is an accurate description of the tenor of the 2 February bay'a.)

Present at this initial ceremony, held in the house of Sharrad b. 'Amar al-Buqquyi (according to later Spanish reports),⁴ on Jabal Sijjum near Ajdir, were some of the important leaders of the Rif: the Faqih 'Ali Bū Lahya, and the Faqih Muhammad al-Shargi, both from the Banū Tūzin

¹ Hart, Aith Waryaghar, p. 377.

² See above, pp. 503-504.

³ Skiraj, op. cit., p. 80.

⁴ Cab. Reb. 1913-1927, pp. 32-34.

and later the executors of the sharī'a-isation policy of the government, 'Abd al-Salām b. al-Ḥājj Muḥand of the Banū Bū 'Ayyāsh clan of the Banū Waryaghāl, and the Minister for War, and Aḥmad Bū Drā' of the Banū Yūsif clan of the Banū Waryaghāl, 'Abd al-Salām's successor as Minister of War. Also present, since this was a local bay'a for the Banū Waryaghāl, were Muḥammad b. Ṣadīq, the powerful leader of the Banū Ḥadhīfa (once again b. Ṣadīq was cooperating with bin 'Abd al-Karīm) and representatives of the Imrabadhan and Aith 'Abdallah, along with men from other Rīfī tribes. From the Buqquya came 'Allūsh b. Ḥaddu, "Angitta" of the Izamuran clan¹—another man whose loyalty to bin 'Abd al-Karīm had not been total in the past, for he was one of the group who had gone to visit Sīdī Ḥamīdu of Snāda in April 1921 to ask him to take over the leadership of the Rīf against the Spanish.² From the Banū Bū Frāḥ came al-Ḥājj Muḥammad b. Misa'ūd Sha'ra of the Awlād Sa'id clan,³ whose anti-Spanish credentials were unimpeachable. He was a rich man, one of the leaders of his tribe⁴ whom the Spanish in 1917 had described as an "old fanatic",⁵ and a man whom bin 'Abd al-Karīm had already appointed as qā'id of his tribe.⁶ The fact that Muḥammad b. Ṣadīq was there shows the pressure that was put on local leaders by the supporters of bin 'Abd al-Karīm to go

¹ Skiraj, op. cit., p. 80.

² See above, p. 295.

³ Skirāj, loc. cit.

⁴ SHM Melilla Leg 27, Información de Alhucemas, carpeta --archivo relativo a la oficina Peñón de Vélez, Relación de los moros mas notables, en los poblados y kabilas que se expresan (Recopilación de datos de 1913 a 1921)--Oct. 1925.

⁵ SHM Melilla Leg. 12, Memorias, Memoria . . . segunda quincena de julio de 1917.

⁶ Skiraj, op. cit., p. 66.

along with them, for bin Ṣadiq was most unreliable in his loyalty himself.

The really significant thing, however, is who was not there. Sī Maḥammad was in Paris, Azarqān and Sī 'Abd al-Salām al-Khaṭṭābī were absent. Above all, bin 'Abd al-Karīm himself was absent.¹ To all appearances, at least, by accepting the bay'a he was only responding to the wishes of his people.

When he did accept, on 21 February 1923, his speech of agreement, according to Skīraj, made precisely this point. He told those present that his Amirate would not be like government by a king, and he would not allow them to treat him as one, for he was their collective voice.² The aim was to defeat the Spanish: "I served with them and I discovered that misfortune had come down on our land from above when they came into it. . . . Let us dedicate ourselves to rescuing ourselves, our people and our land."³ Thus, the Spanish were the main enemy but he was also concerned about any possible threat from the French:

"You must picture yourselves as a prey between the claws of a ferocious beast which is always ready to ravish you. So that I fear that if God gives us victory over it, there is another nation . . . that will not allow us to enjoy our lands in peace and silence. For unbelief is one nation and they will inevitably interfere in our affairs."⁴

However, he felt that the French would not intervene at the moment, and he stressed his desire for peace. He also emphasised that the bay'a did not impinge on the sovereignty of

¹ Ibid., p. 80.

² Ibid., p. 81.

³ Ibid., pp. 81-82.

⁴ Ibid., p. 82.

Mūlāy Yusif.¹ The real need was to fight the Spanish: "There is no doubt that jihād is a duty for us, to attack the enemy that [has come] upon us in our land. We shall defend our religion and our land."² This reference to jihād once again contradicts bin 'Abd al-Karīm's later, widely-quoted, claims to have laid aside jihād as a medieval practice no longer relevant to the modern world.³

The tone of this declaration was not new in the history of the Maghreb. It is most instructive to compare this speech with that of the Algerian Amīr 'Abd al-Qādir, after his acceptance of his bay'a in November 1832. He said:

"I accept this position of amir with reluctance, hoping it will be a vehicle for uniting the Muslims, for preventing strife and dissension among them, for assuring the safety of the roads, for terminating activities which are contrary to the pure Shari'a, for protecting the country from the enemy [i.e., the French], and for establishing law and justice for the powerful and feeble alike. . . . Know that my utmost goal is the unification of the Islamic community and the execution of Islamic practices . . ."⁴

In another proclamation at the same time, 'Abd al-Qādir had stressed the other role of the Caliphate, as the leader of jihād.⁵

It is clear that the language of bin 'Abd al-Karīm's speech and of his bay'a are remarkably similar to that of 'Abd al-Qādir. In other words, the aspirations expressed by bin 'Abd al-Karīm and those of his bay'a were not particularly new or original.

The comparison between 'Abd al-Qādir and 'Abd al-Karīm throws a new light on what was meant in the latter's

¹ Ibid.

² Ibid., p. 83.

³ Leon Gabrielli, Abd el-Krim et les Evénements du Rif (Casablanca, 1950), p. 50.

⁴ Danziger, op. cit., p.72

⁵ Ibid., pp. 72-73.

bay'a by the references to Caliphate. As Danziger has pointed out, the claim to be amir al-mu'minin was in essence a claim to sovereignty.¹ The use of the word Caliph had a similar purpose and implied here not the leadership of all Muslims but the sovereign right to put into effect the rôle of the Caliphate in creating a state independent of the control of unbelievers, in which the shari'a was supreme. It had the effect of laying the basis for a "local Caliphate" when the larger Moroccan Caliphate had fallen into the control of the French. Thus the bay'a gave bin 'Abd al-Karim supreme power, both secular and religious in the Rif.

"Democracy" versus "Dictatorship"

According to 'Allāl al-Fasī, the basis of the new Rifi state was democratic. Democratic structures had been organised following the victories of 1921 with a National Assembly (which he refers to as al-jam'ia al-waṭaniya), composed of representatives of the tribes, shaykhs and military commanders, which drew up a constitution "based on popular sovereignty", but which did not "make a distinction between legal and executive authority as is the constitutional practice in democratic states,"² for both these authorities were invested in Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Karim himself, who alone was responsible to the National Assembly, while the members of his government were responsible to him: "This was in accordance with the traditions of the country which make the king personally responsible to the people,"³ (a remark which seems to imply that bin 'Abd al-Karim was, after all, a king). This description of the government of the Rif is to say the least, both inaccurate and tendentious. Al-Fasī was, after all, interested to present the Rif government as part of the Salafiya-inspired "democratic" nationalist movement which he himself represented. But furthermore, the details are wrong. According to him, there were only four ministers: an assistant to the President, Minister for Foreign Affairs, Minister of Finance, and Minister of trade; "other government positions--such as Minister of the Interior and Minister of War--were left by the constitution in the hands of the President of the Republic."¹ This, he asserts, was the form of government of the "Republic of the Rif".

¹ Ibid., pp. 93-94.

² Al-Fasī, Ḥarakāt, pp. 121-122.

³ Ibid., p. 122.

In fact other government posts did exist--in profusion--and in particular the Ministries of the Interior and War were placed in other hands than those of bin 'Abd al-Karīm. The "Ministry of Trade" does not appear in any other account.

Certainly there was a Parliament of sorts but it was called the majlis al-'umma (The Assembly of the People), not al-jam'ia al-waṭaniya. Hart describes this Assembly--which he refers to as "barlamān" (an Arabisation, or Berberisation, of "parliament")--as "little more than a full-scale tribal agraw of the Aith Arba'in. [i.e., ā'yān] under a new name."²

It was this majlis al-'umma which, after bin 'Abd al-Karīm's acceptance of the bay'a on 21 January 1923, set about giving the proclamation an effective form. In its name

¹ Ibid.

² Hart, Aith Waryaghar, p. 377.

a number of Ministers were appointed. The head of the majlis, Shaykh Yazīd b. al-Ḥājj Ḥammu, was made Minister of the Interior.¹ Yazīd came from the Banū 'Alī clan of the Banū Waryaghal, was a man in his early forties, and had been one of the principal proponents of resistance to the Spanish at the beginning of the war, and had visited the markets to make propaganda in this cause.²

Muḥammad Azarqān, bin 'Abd al-Karīm's brother-in-law, was appointed Minister for Foreign Affairs, and 'Abd al-Salām b. al-Ḥājj Muḥand of the Aith Bū 'Ayyāsh clan of the Banū Waryaghal was appointed Minister of War.³ The post of Minister of Justice ('adl) went to the Faqīh Muḥammad b. 'Abī Abū Laḥya,⁴ the man who had led the expeditions to the Qal'aya in 1921 and later to the Ghumāra. He was not just a war leader, however--although he continued to be present at battles after his appointment to his Ministry. He was a man of some education, having studied in Fez, and was a very efficient propagandist,⁵ not only for the Rifi government, but also for the policy of imposition of the sharī'a, a function he shared with the Qāḍī al-Shargī.

'Abd al-Salām al-Khaṭṭābī, bin 'Abd al-Karīm's paternal uncle--who was only slightly older than he was--was appointed Minister of Finance,⁶ entrusted with the money raised by the ransom of the prisoners, and helped by Aḥmad

¹ Skiraj, op. cit., p. 84.

² Ibid., p. 89; and SHAT, Maroc E.24, "Note sur le Maghzen Riffain", Dec. 1925, p. 3 (henceforth referred to as "Maghzen Riffain").

³ Skiraj, op. cit., p. 84.

⁴ Ibid.

⁵ Ibid., p. 90.

⁶ Ibid., p. 84.

Ugarradh, who was placed in charge of habus property.¹

In fact, these were the people who, by and large, had been occupying these jobs before the formal proclamation of the bay'a, and as bin 'Abd al-Karīm told the majlis al-'umma, they were just the people he would have appointed, and he confirmed them,² an indication that, although the majlis might have been responsible in theory for their appointments, it was really bin 'Abd al-Karīm who had the final word.

However, the majlis al-'umma could make it clear that there were some people of whom it did not approve in positions of responsibility. On 15 January 1923--three days before the first bay'a--it deliberated on the choice of a Minister of Justice, and made the following declaration:

"Praise be to God alone.

When the majlis al-'umma had examined and consulted and circulated the suggestion of the Sayyid Muḥammad b. 'Alī, who is second in command, that the man who should take charge of justice is the faqīh and the erudite man Muḥammādī al-Shams they all replied in the negative and refused to accept it, and they decreed that the undersigned should register their lack of agreement so that a statement of it may be placed before the great Amīr, may God prolong his power and give him victory. On the twenty seventh of Jumāda the First in the year one thousand three hundred and forty one.

The servant of his God

Sha'ib b. Aḥmad al-Ḥatlaṭī . . . [illegible]."³

Bū Laḥya became Minister of Justice. Beneath him was a qāḍī quḍāt (chief qāḍī), Muḥammad bin al-Ṣāliḥ. This man did not himself have the power to appoint qāḍīs but he could recommend suitable people for appointment. For example, in April 1924 he recommended that a certain Aḥmad al-Wajḍirī of the Simsamān be appointed qāḍī of the clan of Raba'a al-Fawqānī in that tribe. The letter is addressed to "Sīdī", but as it ends "it is this that I have the honour to lay before your majesty (jalālatikum)", it seems clear that the recipient was bin 'Abd al-Karīm.¹ Once again the final authority was the amīr.

¹ Ibid.; and Hart, Aith Waryaghar, p. 378.

² Skīraj, op. cit., p. 84.

³ MAEF, Maroc 520, p. 34. Sha'ib b. Aḥmad, announcement on behalf of the majlis al-'umma, 27 Jumāda I 1341/15 Jan. 1923 (Appendix, doc. 5). Hart, Aith Waryaghar, gives "Qadi sh-Shims" as the first Minister of Justice, but this is clearly incorrect in the light of this new evidence.

The aim, in fact, seems to have been to appoint a qāḍī in all the tribes and in the major clans, to ensure the spread of the sharī'a--as Muḥammad b. al-Ṣāliḥ's letter points out.² There were other appointments to be made as well, of course--amīns were needed to oversee the financial affairs of the tribes, and qā'ids to administer them. In February 1924, another note was put out appointing an amīn. It was unsigned but came from the maḥakma of al-Muzimma, the central command post. Again the central authorities were the final arbiters. It read as follows:

"Praise be to God alone. God's mercy be on our Lord Muḥammad, his companions and family.

The Maḥakma of al-Muzimma.

Let it be known from this our letter--may God elevate it and make it effective--that with the [help of] the power and might of God--we have appointed the excellent and distinguished Sayyid Muḥammad bin 'Umar al-'Umarānī to be our chief 'amīn in the Wargha. On being informed of this everyone should act in accordance with his [instructions] and not disobey them.

¹ MAEF, Maroc 519, p. 185, letter, Muḥammad b. al-Ṣāliḥ to (bin 'Abd al-Karīm), 23 Ramaḡān 1342/28 Apr. 1924.

² Ibid. See the text of the document in the Appendix (No. 6).

And peace.

On 2 Jumāda II 1342."¹

The appointment of qā'ids in tribes was a touchy business, as Sī Maḥammad had discovered in Targīst in 1922.² After the proclamation of his bay'a, bin 'Abd al-Karīm was still faced with this problem. In February 1924, the people of Burid in the Gaznaya tribe wrote to bin 'Abd al-Karīm in very fulsome terms asking that a certain Qā'id Muḥammad Amziyyān b. al-Ḥājj Ta'juntī should be their 'āmil.³ Apparently bin 'Abd al-Karīm immediately acceded to their request, for on the same day a local bay'a, recognising Muḥammad Amziyyān, was issued, signed by many of the notables of Burid.⁴ Once again, although bin 'Abd al-Karīm asked for suggestions about the most suitable candidate to be appointed, it was the amīr's authority that confirmed the appointment and the local people were well aware of the fact.

A Makhzan in the Rīf?

This organisation, a government with ministers, qādīs and a qāḍī quḍāt, amīns, and qā'ids, looks very like a Rīfī version of the traditional form of a Moroccan makhzan. As David Hart has pointed out, all the titles given to those ¹ Ibid., p. 196, unsigned letter of appointment as 'amīn al-'umanā' of Muḥammad b. 'Umar al-'Umrānī, 29 Jumāda II 1342/6 Feb. 1924. This document is reproduced in the Appendix (No. 7). Al-Muzimma, it will be recalled, was the name of the position at the mouth of the Wādī Nakūr which had been the port of Bādīs in the Middle Ages (see above, p. 101). It is therefore likely that al-Bū 'Ayyāshī is incorrect in putting it south of Ajdīr (op. cit., vol. II, p. 134).

²

See above, p. 499.

³ MAEF, Maroc 519, p. 206, All the people of Burid to Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Karīm, Burid, 12 Rajab 1343/18 Feb. 1924.

⁴ Ibid., p. 53, Jama'a of Burid, accepting Muḥammad b. Amziyyān b. al-Ḥājj Ta'guntī as 'āmil, 12 Rajab 1342/18 Feb. 1924.

Photograph IX : 1

Muḥammad Azarqān, Rifi Minister of Foreign Affairs

Source: Archives of the Servicio Histórico Militar, Madrid.

who held positions in the Rifi state were Arabic rather than Berber.¹ Even more significant were the large numbers of lesser positions which were filled, for the main ministries mentioned above were by no means the only posts. As Hart again remarks: "One of the most striking facts about the Moroccan political system in general . . . is the overabundance of legitimacy: there are . . . far more claimants to office than there [are] jobs to go round."²

This was partly the result of the large proportion of bin 'Abd al-Karīm's family which was involved in the Rifi government. A glance at a family tree (Table 1) shows that, of his close relatives and their husbands, no less than 11 were at some point involved in the government. They ranged from important figures such as 'Abd al-Salām, his uncle, and Minister of Finance; his cousin (and brother-in-law), Aḥmad Bū Drā , later Minister of War; and his brother-in-law Muḥammad Azarqān, the Minister for Foreign Affairs (see Photograph IX : 1), to the second or third-rank leaders such as Muḥammad b. al-Ḥājj Sī Muḥammad, a brother-in-law of bin 'Abd al-Karīm, who was a secretary.

Of course, not all the members of the Rifi government were relatives of bin 'Abd al-Karīm, although the majority were from the Banū Waryaghal.³ However, the officials most concerned with the implementation of the sharī'a policy, Bū Laḥya, Qāḍī al-Shargī (both from the Banū Tūzīn), and a later Minister of Justice, Muḥammad b. 'Amar b. 'Abdallah of the Timsamān, and the Qāḍī Quḍāt Muḥammad b. Ṣalāḥ of the Timsamān, were not even from bin 'Abd al-Karīm's tribe. In other words, for this function bin 'Abd al-Karīm preferred to rely on people with an ideological and religious commitment to the imposition of the sharī'a rather than on people who were defined solely by their relationship to himself.

¹ Hart, Aith Waryathar, p. 385.

² Ibid., p. 380.

³ Hart, Aith Waryaghar, pp. 378-379.

So, with all the outward appearances of a makhzan, was this in fact what existed in the Rif under bin 'Abd al-Karīm? Certainly the people of Burid in the Gaznaya referred to the government as such. They asked for the appointment of an 'āmil to serve as "an intermediary between us and the Makhzan,"¹ and in their letter of acceptance they repeated this formula.² On the other hand, as might perhaps have been expected, the Spanish supporters and agents in the Rif occupied areas referred to the Spanish administration as the makhzan. Thus a man from the Banū Tūzīn, Shaykh 'Allāl b. 'Allāl Ighārbī, wrote to the Spanish in February 1923 in these terms.³ So it appears that "the Makhzan" depended on who was speaking: Spanish agents saw the Spanish as the makhzan, and pro-Rifis saw the new government headed by bin 'Abd al-Karīm as the makhzan. The point is that while he acted as a Sultan, bin 'Abd al-Karīm presented himself as such by popular acclamation, and his makhzan (and that of the Spanish) gained authority in just the same way; the Rif government acted as a makhzan, and in increasingly powerful one. Despite the initial flurry of activity by the majlis al-'umma, that assembly's power was always limited:

¹ MAEF, Maroc 519, p. 206. All the people of Burid to Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Karīm, 12 Rajab 1342/18 Feb. 1924.

² Ibid., p. 53, Jamā'a of Burid, accepting appointment of 'āmil, 12 Rajab 1342/18 Feb. 1924.

³ SHM Melilla Leg. 22, Cartas Arabes 1, Bani Tuzin, Shaykh 'Allāl b. 'Allāl Ighārbī al-Tūzānī and Shaykh Muḥammad b. 'Amar to Colonel, 2 Rajab 1341/18 Feb. 1923.

even when it agreed not to accept Qāḍī al-Shams as Minister of Justice it laid the whole matter in bin 'Abd al-Karīm's hands for a final decision. By 1924 the people of Burid were acknowledging the authority of the makhzan and trying to get bin 'Abd al-Karīm to appoint an 'āmil to be "the intermediary between us and the Makhzan", with no reference to the assembly at all. It was effectively a contractual arrangement between a Sultan and a local group in the traditional manner of Moroccan politics.

If bin 'Abd al-Karīm's government acted as a makhzan it was, however, no longer a matter of a distant Sultan in Fez confirming a powerful local figure in his position in order to gain his support--as Mūlāy 'Abd al-'Azīz, Mūlāy 'Abd al-Ḥafīz, or Mūlāy Zain had done in the case of al-Raisūlī, or even of bin 'Abd al-Karīm's father,¹ but of a powerful central authority in Ajdīr, which certainly confirmed the wishes of local people as bin 'Abd al-Karīm had done in Burid, but also was quite capable, even before the bay'a was proclaimed, of removing local qā'ids and substituting others. The immediacy of this authority is reflected in the curtness of the documents of appointment.

These officials, the local representatives of the central authority, gave bin 'Abd al-Karīm's administration a quite considerable power, which was backed up by a small but always growing bureaucracy. There were officials to administer the habūs property--one Aḥmad Ū Gharradh,² several secretaries,³ and a man, Sī Muḥammad b. Qashush, whose function was to keep records of taxation.¹ In addition, the two important ministries of Justice and War had a large number of assistants, whose rôle will be discussed later.

¹ See above, p. 145.

² "Maghzen Riffain", p. 3. and Hart, Aith Waryaghar, p. 378.

³ Apart from Muḥammad bin Sī Muḥammādī these were al-Ḥājj b. Hitmī, Qā'id Ṣadiq and an Algerian Sī Hassan b. 'Abd al-'Aziz, "Maghzen Riffain", passim, Hart, op. cit., p. 380.

However, from all this it should not be assumed that all the members of the government spent all their time on administrative matters, for many of them still saw their most essential task as defeating the Spanish. The most notable example of this is Bū Laḥya the Minister for Justice, who spent a considerable part of his time in military expeditions. For example, in September 1923, he was sent by bin 'Abd al-Karīm to the Ghumāra to raise troops,² in May 1924 he was sent to the Marnīsa for the same reason because that tribe was refusing to provide a ḥarka,³ in May of the same year he only succeeded in escaping capture during the Ghumāra revolt.⁴ However, as will be seen, this did not prevent him from putting the policy of enforcement of the sharī'a into effect with considerable vigour. In fact, it is often difficult to distinguish between the military activities and the civil activities of the Rifi administration, a situation which, of course, resulted from the war. Thus the qā'ids whom bin 'Abd al-Karīm appointed in the tribes were placed under the control of Pashas--the military commanders of the regions with their headquarters in military command posts, referred to as maḥakmas.

The main maḥakma was at the military headquarters at Ait Qamāra in the Imrabadhan clan of the Banū Waryathal.

¹ "Maghzen Riffain", p. 3.

² SHM Melilla Leg. 23, Información Septiembre, Resumen General de Confidencias, 9 Sept. 1923.

³ SHM Melilla Leg. 24, Información Marzo, Resumen General 23 Mar. 1924 and Resumen General 24 Mar. 1924.

⁴ Skīraj, op. cit., pp. 126-127.

Photograph IX: 2

A Rifi field gun, captured from the Spanish or the French, photographed after the surrender of bin 'Abd al-Karim in May 1926

Source: The Illustrated London News, 15 June
-1926, p.1012

in the mountains overlooking the Wādī Ghīs. This was where bin 'Abd al-Karīm kept his family, safe from Spanish bombing missions, and had one of his principal camps for prisoners of war.¹ As we have seen, there was another maḥakma at al-Muzimma, at the mouth of the Wādī Ghīs. A third and vitally important maḥakma was at Akshāb Amghār, on the west bank of the Wādī Amqarān, between Dahar Abarrān and Anwāl in the tribe of Timsamān. This maḥakma covered the defence of the whole eastern front in the tribes of Timsamān, Banū Tūzīn, Banū Sa'id, Banū Walishak, al-Maṭālsa, and the eastern part of the Gaznaya. In charge of this position for the first part of 1923 was the Minister of War, 'Abd al-Salām b. al-Ḥājj Muḥand of the Banū Bū 'Ayyāsh clan of the Banū Waryaghal.² The western part of the Gaznaya tribe, and the tribes of Marnīsa, and those of the Sinhāja Srair were placed under the maḥakma at Targīst, and that at Banū Bū Frāḥ covered the western front, and undertook political action in the Ghumāra and Jibāla.³ The force behind this organisation lay with the new Rīfī regular army.

The Foundation of the Regular Army

Bin 'Abd al-Karīm had started to create a modern trained force even before the Anwāl victories, but the real impetus came when he had both equipment and money to carry out a complete reorganisation of the Rīfī forces. The equipment, of course, came from that captured by the Rīfīs from the Spanish, and although a fair amount was never recovered by Ḥaddu b. Ḥammu and others, the quantities that they did take back to the Rif were enormous. The money mainly came from the ransoms of the Spanish prisoners of war. The four million pesetas was indeed used, as the Wargha tribes had predicted, "against you and us".¹

¹ Al-Bū 'Ayyāshī, op. cit., vol. II, pp. 134, 144. For the position of this maḥakma see the discussion above on p. 531, n. 1.

² Ibid., p. 134, and Skīraj, op. cit., pp. 92-93.

³ Al-Bū 'Ayyāshī, op. cit., Vol. II, p. 135, and Skīraj, op. cit., pp. 92-93.

There were several men responsible for the new army. The first was Sha'ib b. Ḥammādī al-Falāḥ, who had been one of the leaders in the abortive attack on the Ghumāra in 1921 and 1922.² Bin 'Abd al-Karīm had met him at Anwāl and according to al-Bū 'Ayyāshī had decided that al-Falāḥ was a suitable person to take control of the training of the new army when he discovered that when al-Falāḥ was called away from repairing guns captured from the Spanish--a technique at which he was expert--he had hidden part of the trigger of the gun on which he was working, thereby disabling it so that it could not be sold back to the Spanish. This so impressed bin 'Abd al-Karīm with his caution that he put al-Falāḥ in charge of the regular army.³ Al-Falāḥ took 'Amar b. Muḥ b. Sa'id of the Banū Bū 'Ayyāsh to the Monday market of the Banū Bū 'Ayyāsh, where they made an initial recruitment of 75 men, although the numbers soon reached 900 men, and were initially divided into 3 ṭabūrs, presumably of 300 men each.⁵

¹ See above, p. 501.

² His origins are disputed--al-Bū 'Ayyāshī (op. cit., vol. II, p. 176) says he came from the Timsamān, Hart (Aith Waryaghar, p. 386) says he was a Waryaghli from the Banū 'Alī.

³ Al-Bū 'Ayyāshī, op. cit., p. 176.

⁴ Ibid.

⁵ However, estimates of the full complement of a ṭabūr in the Rifi army vary. Skiraj, op. cit., p. 93, puts it at 500, Godeḥ, op. cit., p. 97, at 400, some of Hart's informants at 300, others at 500--Hart himself (Aith Waryaghar, p. 386) opts for 500. But the numbers and organisation of the ṭabūrs tended to fluctuate greatly anyway.

The first commanders of these ṭabūrs were al-Falāḥ, Muḥammad b. 'Amar b. Hammīsh of the Banū Brāhim sub-clan of the Banū Waryaghāl, and Muḥammad Buḥūt of the Qal'aya.¹ This last ṭabūr was apparently largely made up of artillery men, as was a fourth which was set up later.

The bases of these artillery ṭabūrs already existed. In late 1922, and possibly before, there had been definite groups of people who were described as "artillery-men" in the accounts of payments. They were a fairly defined group, mainly, though by no means entirely, made up of people from the Banū Waryaghāl. For instance, on 7 February 1922 there were four men at Tahlilāth in the Banū Walishak, of whom two were from the Banū al-Qādī of the Banū Waryaghāl clan of Murābiṭīn, eleven at Azragznāi in the same tribe, of whom three were from the Banū 'Abdallah clan of the Banū Waryaghāl, one from the Marnīsa and one from the Banū Walishak, seven at al-Nazūr of the Banū Walishak, of whom three were Waryaghālīs (one from Banū al-Qādī and two from Tamasind), six at Thasliqū in the Banū Walishak (three from the Banū Waryaghāl), eleven in the Tafarsit tribe, of whom three were from the Banū Qiyadhān sub-clan of the Banū Waryaghāl, and so on.³

The significant thing, however, is the relatively

¹ Al-Bū 'Ayyāshī, op. cit., Vol. II, pp. 176-177.

² Hart, Aith Waryaghar, p. 386.

³ MAEF, Maroc 519, pp. 81-82, Lists of payments to artillery-men, 15 Muḥarrām 1341/7 Sept. 1922, and 3 Ṣafar 1341/25 Sept. 1922, and 6 Ṣafar 1341/28 Sept. 1922, and 7 Ṣafar 1341/29 Sept. 1922. The word used in these lists for "artillery-man" is تجیة (tabjiya). This is not an Arabic word but it is a Turkish one. The Ottoman word for "artillery-man" is طوبجی (topji), J.W. Redhouse, Redhouses's Turkish Dictionary, 2nd ed. revised by Charles Wells (London, 1880), p. 642. A typical list of payments is reproduced in the Appendix (No. 8).

small group at the centre of these artillery-men. There seems to have been a small group of men who were kept in the same area but moved around as they were needed. For instance, al-'Abbās b. al-ḥājǰ Muḥammad of the Banū Qiyadhān sub-clan of the Banū Waryaghāl was moved from Tudhītha near Tafarsīt on 7 September 1922¹ to Tawrirt in the same tribe on 11 October.² One of these men, Aḥmad al-Sūsī, who was certainly not a Rifī, was at Wardāna on 28 September.³ He eventually became the qā'id of the second artillery ṭabūr. Two of his deputies in that ṭabūr, a certain al-Maṭālī from the Gharb, and one al-Mufaḍḍal, apparently were not Rifīs either.⁴ These non-Rifīs were undoubtedly employed because of their European-taught military skills. The best example of this was Muḥammad Buhūt, a Qal'ayī who had been an officer in the Spanish Fuerzas Regulares before the outbreak of the war. However, he joined the Rifīs very soon and quickly distinguished himself in their cause. In August 1921, he killed a shaykh from the Banū Bū Ifrūr whom he suspected of being pro-Spanish after a speech the shaykh had made, recommending negotiations with the Spanish.⁵ He later led those Rifī forces which remained in the Qal'aya while the main body pulled back to the Banū Sa'id.⁶

At lower levels, there were qā'ids over different

¹ MAEF, Maroc 519, p. 81, List of artillery-men, 15 Muḥarrām 1341/7 Sept. 1922, no. 33.

² Ibid., p. 80, List of soldiers and payments, 19 Ṣafar 1341/11 Oct. 1923, no. 7.

³ Ibid., p. 78, List of soldiers and pay, 6 Ṣafar 1341/28 Sept. 1922.

⁴ Hart, Aith Waryaghar, p. 386.

⁵ SHM Melilla Leg. 18, Información Agosto, SI 'Alī al-ḥiḥī, 19 Aug. 1921

⁶ SHM Melilla Leg. 18, Información Septiembre, SI 'Alī al-ḥiḥī, 26 Sept. 1921.

sized groups of men. Thus there was a qā'id miatain wa-khamsīn over each 250 men, a qā'id al-mia over each 100 men, a qā'id khamsīn over each 50 men, a qā'id khamsa wa-'ashrīn over each 25 men, a qā'id ithnā-'ashar over each 12 men, and beneath them the ordinary soldiers.¹ The rates of pay vary according to the accounts given. The best way to reproduce these various amounts in in the form of a table:

Table IX:-2

Pay of officers and men in the Rifī regular army according to various sources, in pesetas per month²

	Hart	al-Bū 'Ayyāshī	Skīraj
Soldier	60	60	75
Qā'id 12	65	-	90
Qā'id 25	70	75	100
Qā'id 50	80	80	125
Qā'id 100	100	100	200
Qā'id 250	-	-	-
Qā'id ṭabūr	125	150	300
Qā'id 1,000	-	-	500

These theoretical rates do not in fact compare with those given in September 1922 to the artillery-men in the Banū Walishak, who were paid 25 pts for the three weeks from 7 September to 28 September, a rate of 33 pts a month.³

These troops had a wide variety of arms--guns they had captured from the Spanish--such as the 1888-model Spanish

¹ Hart, Aith Waryaghar, p. 386, and Skīraj, op. cit., p. 93.

² Al-Bū 'Ayyāshī, op. cit., Vol. II, p. 177; Hart, Aith Waryaghar, p. 387; Skīraj, op. cit., p. 94.

³ MAEF, Maroc 519, p. 82. Artillery-men and payments, 15 Muḥarram 1341/7 Sept. 1922, and 6 Ṣafar 1341/28 Sept. 1922, e.g., nos. 5-8.

Mauser-guns they had obtained by purchase--mainly French Lebel 1886-model repeaters--or ones that they had before Anwāl, mainly old Moroccan-made Bū Ḥafūra muskets. The heavy artillery was mainly captured Spanish equipment-- Gabrielli estimated that at the end of 1924 the Rifis had about 200 Spanish field guns.¹ Bombs were made by local technicians from unexploded bombs dropped by Spanish aeroplanes. Al-Bū 'Ayyāshī estimates that from one 200 kilo bomb they could make 470 hand-made bombs locally.² The main arms dumps for this equipment were at Azghār in the Banū Waryaghal, Bū Hāim, also in the Banū Waryaghal, Bū Salāḥ, again in the Banū Waryaghal in the upper reaches of the Wādī Ghīs, and at the maḥakmas--especially that at Akshāb Amghār in the Timsamān.³ The repair shops for these weapons were at Anwāl under the supervision of al-Mu'allim Muḥand, a Timsamānī who had 25 men, many of them from the Banū Bū Frāḥ, working under him.⁴ Muḥand was a master armourer who had for long been opposed to Spanish intervention--in August 1919, when he was working at the Friday market in the Timsamān, 'Abd al-Karīm al-Khaṭṭābī, the amīr's father, had contacted him at the beginning of his efforts to foment an anti-Spanish coalition.⁵

Not surprisingly, in a period of war, the army was perhaps the most closely administered section of the government's activity. . . There was an official to take care of . . .

¹ Léon Gabrielli, Abd-el-Krim et les Evénements du Rif 1924-1926, Notes et Souvenirs recueillis et présentés par Roger Coindreau (Casablanca, 1953), p. 50.

² Al-Bū 'Ayyāshī, op. cit., Vol. II, p. 163.

³ Ibid., pp. 172-174.

⁴ Ibid., p. 174.

⁵ SHM Melilla Leg. 15, Memorias Quincenales, Alhucemas, Memoria . . . segunda quincena de agosto de 1919.

Photograph IX 3

(Left) Muḥammad Bū Jibār, mutaṣarrif

(Right) Maḥammad bin 'Abd al-Karīm, brother of the amīr

Source: Illustrated London News, 20 September
1924, p. 519

Photograph IX : 4

A Rifi air-raid shelter, photographed in 1926

Source: Illustrated London News, 29 May 1926

supplies of food, 'Abd al-Karīm al-Hattāsh of Ajdīr, one to deal with military supplies, Aḥmad Shammūrī¹ and a paymaster--mutaṣarrif--Sī Muḥammad bū Jibār, bin 'Abd al-Karīm's brother-in-law (see Photograph IX : 3).² A careful record seems to have been kept, not only of payments, which have already been discussed, but also of the distribution of arms.³ Apparently, the soldiers were paid in accordance with a number stitched on the turban of each man.⁴ The turbans also indicated both rank and the military arm to which the soldiers belonged. Ordinary soldiers wore green turbans,⁵ while officers wore red turbans with green stripes indicating rank (three for a qā'id ṭabūr, two for a qā'id 100, one for a qā'id 50, a half stripe for a qā'id 25, and no stripe for a qā'id 12), machine gunners wore black turbans.⁶

In addition, soldiers had strict instructions on how to conduct themselves. A list of army regulations was found on the body of a dead soldier in 1926 and read as follows:

"Praise be to God alone.

God bless our Lord Mohammed and his family.

Note of the military regulations 6 Ṣafar 1344
(26 August 1925)

I. All officers must obey each other according to rank.

II. All orders must be obeyed without question.

III. There can be no change or alteration in the position of a caid once he has been appointed, and no one may have

¹ "Maghzen Riffain", p. 6.

² Ibid., p. 3.; Hart, Aith Waryaghar, p. 378.

³ MAEF, Maroc 520, p. 77 shows a number of slips giving the distribution of arms dated Sha'bān 1344/Feb.-Mar. 1926.

⁴ SHM Melilla Leg. 27, Información Alhucemas, 'Abd al-Salām b. 'Amar b. 'Abd al-Karīm (Banū Waryaghal), 29 Nov. 1925.

⁵ Ibid., and Goded, op. cit., p. 94.

⁶ Ibid.

rank reduced without the authorisation of the Emir.

IV. Each caïd must know by heart the names of all his soldiers, and keep on him at all times a list of their names on which he will write the day on which each one leaves his command either through death, absence or for any other reason.

V. Each officer must know the number of guns and cartridges held by his soldiers.

VI. The caïds in the front line must make an inspection with the officer of the post, and must make the latter responsible for everything concerned with arms and cartridges.

VII. Immediately they arrive at a position, the caïds must have trenches dug, build air-raid shelters [see photograph IX : 3] and remove all rubbish.

VIII. No one in any position may flee from the enemy if he attacks. Anyone who does so will be punished.

IX. No one may leave his post at the end of his tour of duty, before his relief arrives. If he does, he will be punished.

X. The fine for being late on arrival at a post will be half a rial a day, payable when the latecomer does arrive. The money so collected will be equally divided among those who were on time.

XI. Anyone who interrupts his time in the harka is equally liable to a fine of half a rial a day. The product of these fines will be divided among the caïds who remain on duty. The Pasha or his Khalifa, will receive one third and the other two thirds will be given to the caïd 100 and his subordinates.

XII. No caïd shall give leave to any of his men in exchange for money. If he does he will be liable to a prison sentence, according to his rank. This penalty will be applied to a caïd 25, or a caïd 50, or a caïd 100.

XIII. Anyone who wishes to impose a fine be it great or small, must first consult the minister of War--who will refer it to our Lord--God give him victory.

XIV. All those who carry an arm must take care that it is not damaged. He who through negligence breaks it or exchanges it etc, must repay the value. The same applies to a man who sells his arm, and he will be put in prison until he has repaid the value.

XV. The caïd 100, as all the other caïds must fight along with his own men and not mix them with those of another officer.

Peace.

Approved by the Minister of War the Caid Ahmed ben Draa[sic]. God protect him."¹

¹ SHAT, Maroc E24, Propagande Riffaine enclosed in letter Ministre Plenipotentiaire Resident Général du Maroc to Ministre de Guerre, Rabat, 10 Apr. 1926.

The orders lay down a strict hierarchy of command, through local qā'ids to pashas to the Minister of War, and finally to bin 'Abd al-Karīm himself. Through such a structure, the amīr's authority would be guaranteed by an army which owed its loyalty not to tribal leaders but to himself.

In addition to these orders and the identity patches on their turbans, the Rifi soldiers were given yet another symbol of their organisation. They were issued with identity cards, reportedly with their photographs stuck to them.¹

The Rifi "Navy"

When it became necessary to set up some form of military control over sea transport, the first person to be put in charge of it was Ra'is Misa'ūd b. 'Amar "Sibara", the Buqquyī who had a history of gun-running and smuggling along the coast, which went back to 1896. He had joined the Rifi movement just before Abarrān, only after a great deal of pressure had been applied to him.² Yet he seems to have been loyal to bin 'Abd al-Karīm thereafter and was rewarded with the title of "Inspector of Marine".³ In fact, this title was more imposing than realistic, for the Rifi navy consisted of no more than a few rowing boats and two motor launches.⁴ Ra'is Misa'ūd came to a violent end in November ¹ SHM Ceuta Leg. 23, Información Oficina Central Abril 1924, nota, 6 Apr. 1924. If the detail about the photographs is correct, they may have been taken by Josef Klemms, a German deserter from the French Foreign Legion who had fled to the Rif where he became bin 'Abd al-Karīm's official photographer. Sheean, Adventures, p. 275.

² See above, pp. 161-162, 300.

³ Hart, Aith Waryaghar, p. 378.

⁴ Goded, op. cit., p. 102.

1924, when he was murdered by a brother of Ḥaddu b. Ḥammu al-Kaḥal. Apparently the brother felt that Misa'ūd should sell him some land to which he felt himself entitled, and when Misa'ūd refused he shot him.¹ The Spanish report on this affair described Sibara as "a native from Buqqiuy [sic] charged with carrying out contraband along the coast."² This does, in fact, seem a fair description of the Rifi navy's function, for arms, ammunition and supplies were brought in from Tangier. The sea was clearly the quickest way of communicating with the Ghumāra, and when al-Raisūlī was captured in 1925, he was taken to Ajdīr in a boat from Wādī Lāw.³

Sibara was replaced by Ḥaddu b. 'Alī b. al-Muqaddam, an Ajdīrī,⁴ who bought one of the motor launches from an American in Tangier to make the sea route to the Ghumāra that much more reliable.⁵ Furthermore, considerable care was taken of the Rifi boats and they were stored under the cliffs at Alhucemas to protect them from Spanish air raids (see Photograph IX : 5).

The Irregular Army

The total strength of the regular army was never

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 25, Información Noviembre, nota, 6 Nov. 1924.

² Ibid., nota, 3 Nov. 1924. On the other hand, 'Abd al-Karīm b. al-Ḥājj 'Alī, Sibara's brother-in-law told the French that he had been killed by a servant of Muḥammad Azarqān, the Minister of Foreign Affairs (SHAT, Maroc Riff 14, Dossier III, Mars 1926, Renseignements donnés par Abd el Krim el Hadj Ali el Boucougi, Tangier, Mar. 1926). However, both accounts are agreed that Sibara was murdered. Hart (Aith Waryaghar, p. 378) says that Sibara defected to the Spanish, but this is clearly incorrect in the light of this new evidence.

³ Hernández Mir, op. cit., Vol. II, p. 257.

⁴ Al-Bū 'Ayyāshī, op. cit., Vol. II, p. 175.

⁵ Ibid.

Photograph IX : 5

The Rifi boats stored under the cliffs near Alhucemas Bay; an oblique aerial photograph taken by a Spanish reconnaissance aeroplane. The large boat in the open enclosure is one of the motor launches.

Source: The Illustrated London News, 22 November 1924, p. 987.

high. Bin 'Abd al-Karīm put it at 6,000-7000,¹ but Hart and Goded give 3,000 and 2,000 respectively.² Clearly these numbers were insufficient to defend the Rīf against the Spanish troops, so ḥarkas from the different tribes were raised in the old way, as well.

While Sha'ib b. al-Falāḥ and others were recruiting for the regular army, bin 'Abd al-Karīm wrote to the various shaykhs in the Banū Tūzīn. As a result, some of those shaykhs reported to the Spanish:

"We went to see him, and he spoke with us, and said to us 'Be on your guard against the Spanish and form an army under your authority and we will send the supplies', and we replied 'We shall consult among ourselves over what is best for all concerned',"³ a formula which gave them the opportunity to delay further. Clearly, however, bin 'Abd al-Karīm was relying on local support under the authority of local leaders in tribal groups --just as he had done to form the original ḥarkas.

In July 1923, another Tūzānī shaykh wrote to the Spanish to inform them that "The Muslims, that is the mujāḥidīn, have called openly in the markets of the Banū Waryaghāl for an attack against us."⁴ Ten days later the same man reported that this propaganda had been successful:

"The Banū Waryaghāl [have formed] a ḥarka for after the 'īd ['īd al-Kabīr which was less than one month away] which will come with violence upon us and will attack you and us."⁵

¹ Roger-Mathieu, op. cit., p. 140.

² Hart, Aith Waryaghr, p. 385, and Goded, op. cit., p. 95.

³ SHM Melilla Leg. 22, Cartas Arabes 1, Bani Tuzin, Shaykh 'Allāl, b. 'Amar Igharbī al-Tūzānī and Shaykh Muḥammad b. 'Amar to Comandante Claudín, 2 Rajab 1341/18 Feb. 1923.

⁴ Ibid., Shaykh 'Allāl b. Muḥand to Captain, received 1 July, 1923.

⁵ Ibid., Shaykh 'Allāl b. Muḥand to Colonel, received 11 July 1923.

Photograph IX : 6

Rifi irregular troops on the way to the front

Source: Illustrated London News, 20 September
1924, p. 519

Photograph IX : 7

Rifi irregulars on the way to the front line;
the son of a shaykh (on the right) much better dressed than the ordinary irregular troops.

Source: The Illustrated London News, 20 September
1924, p. 519.

Announcements in the markets were the traditional way of calling together a ḥarka, and in August 1923 bin 'Abd al-Karīm made it the responsibility of his qā'ids to organise this form of recruitment,¹ and in early September, Bū Laḥya was sent to the Ghumāra to recruit a ḥarka there.² Recruiting in the markets continued in 1924--for instance, in January of that year bin 'Abd al-Karīm tried to recruit a ḥarka against 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu in the markets,³ and indeed throughout the war. (See Photographs IX : 6, 7, 8.)

The Building of Communications

A modern, centralised state such as the one which bin 'Abd al-Karīm proposed for the Rif needed rapid and efficient communications between the centre and the outlying areas. The two most efficient methods of communication were roads and telephones, and bin 'Abd al-Karīm did his best to ensure that both were constructed.

At the beginning of February 1923, as part of the general propaganda surrounding his proclamation, bin 'Abd al-Karīm sent letters to the Timsamān and other tribes giving them one month in which to submit to his authority. He also told them he was going to build a road and that European nations would be sending help.⁴ By November of 1923, he was building roads into the Gaznaya from Ajdir, to Hassi

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 23, Información Agosto, Sī Muḥammad al-Faḥsī, 13 Aug. 1923.

² SHM Melilla Leg. 23, Información Septiembre, Resumen General de Confidencias, 9 Sept. 1923.

³ SHM Melilla Leg. 24, Informaciones Enero, Resumen General de Confidencias, 28 Jan. 1924.

⁴ SHM Melilla Leg. 23, Información Febrero, T.O.C. Comandante Intervención to Comandante General and Coronel de P.I., Tafarsit, 7 Feb. 1923.

Wazanga, and to 'Ain Midyūna¹ (see Map IX : 1). According to al-Bū 'Ayyāshī, the man in overall charge of this programme of road building was a certain Muḥ Muzūr, who was illiterate.²

The construction of these roads was by no means an easy process. One of the people in charge of the stretch of road being built in the Buqquya (presumably part of the Ajdīr to Targīst road) asked the maḥakma of the tribe to write to Sī Maḥammad asking him to send measuring implements, shovels, and other equipment "because the road in the Buqquya is very difficult with many stones in it. Unless [we receive this] equipment it will be impossible to set the road to rights as quickly as our Lord [i.e., bin 'Abd al-Karīm] has ordered."³ At the same time, he asked for black and white paint for sign-writing on the walls of the maḥakma in the Buqquya.⁴

The main labour force for this work was drawn from the prisoners held by bin 'Abd al-Karīm. The list of Moroccan prisoners held at the main prison, Ajdīr, on 5 May, records that 37 were absent building the "earth motor road in Buqquya". In this case, all were captured supporters of 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu,⁵ although captured French and Spanish prisoners were also used.⁶

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 23, Información Noviembre, Muḥammad Muḥammādī, 23 Nov. 1923.

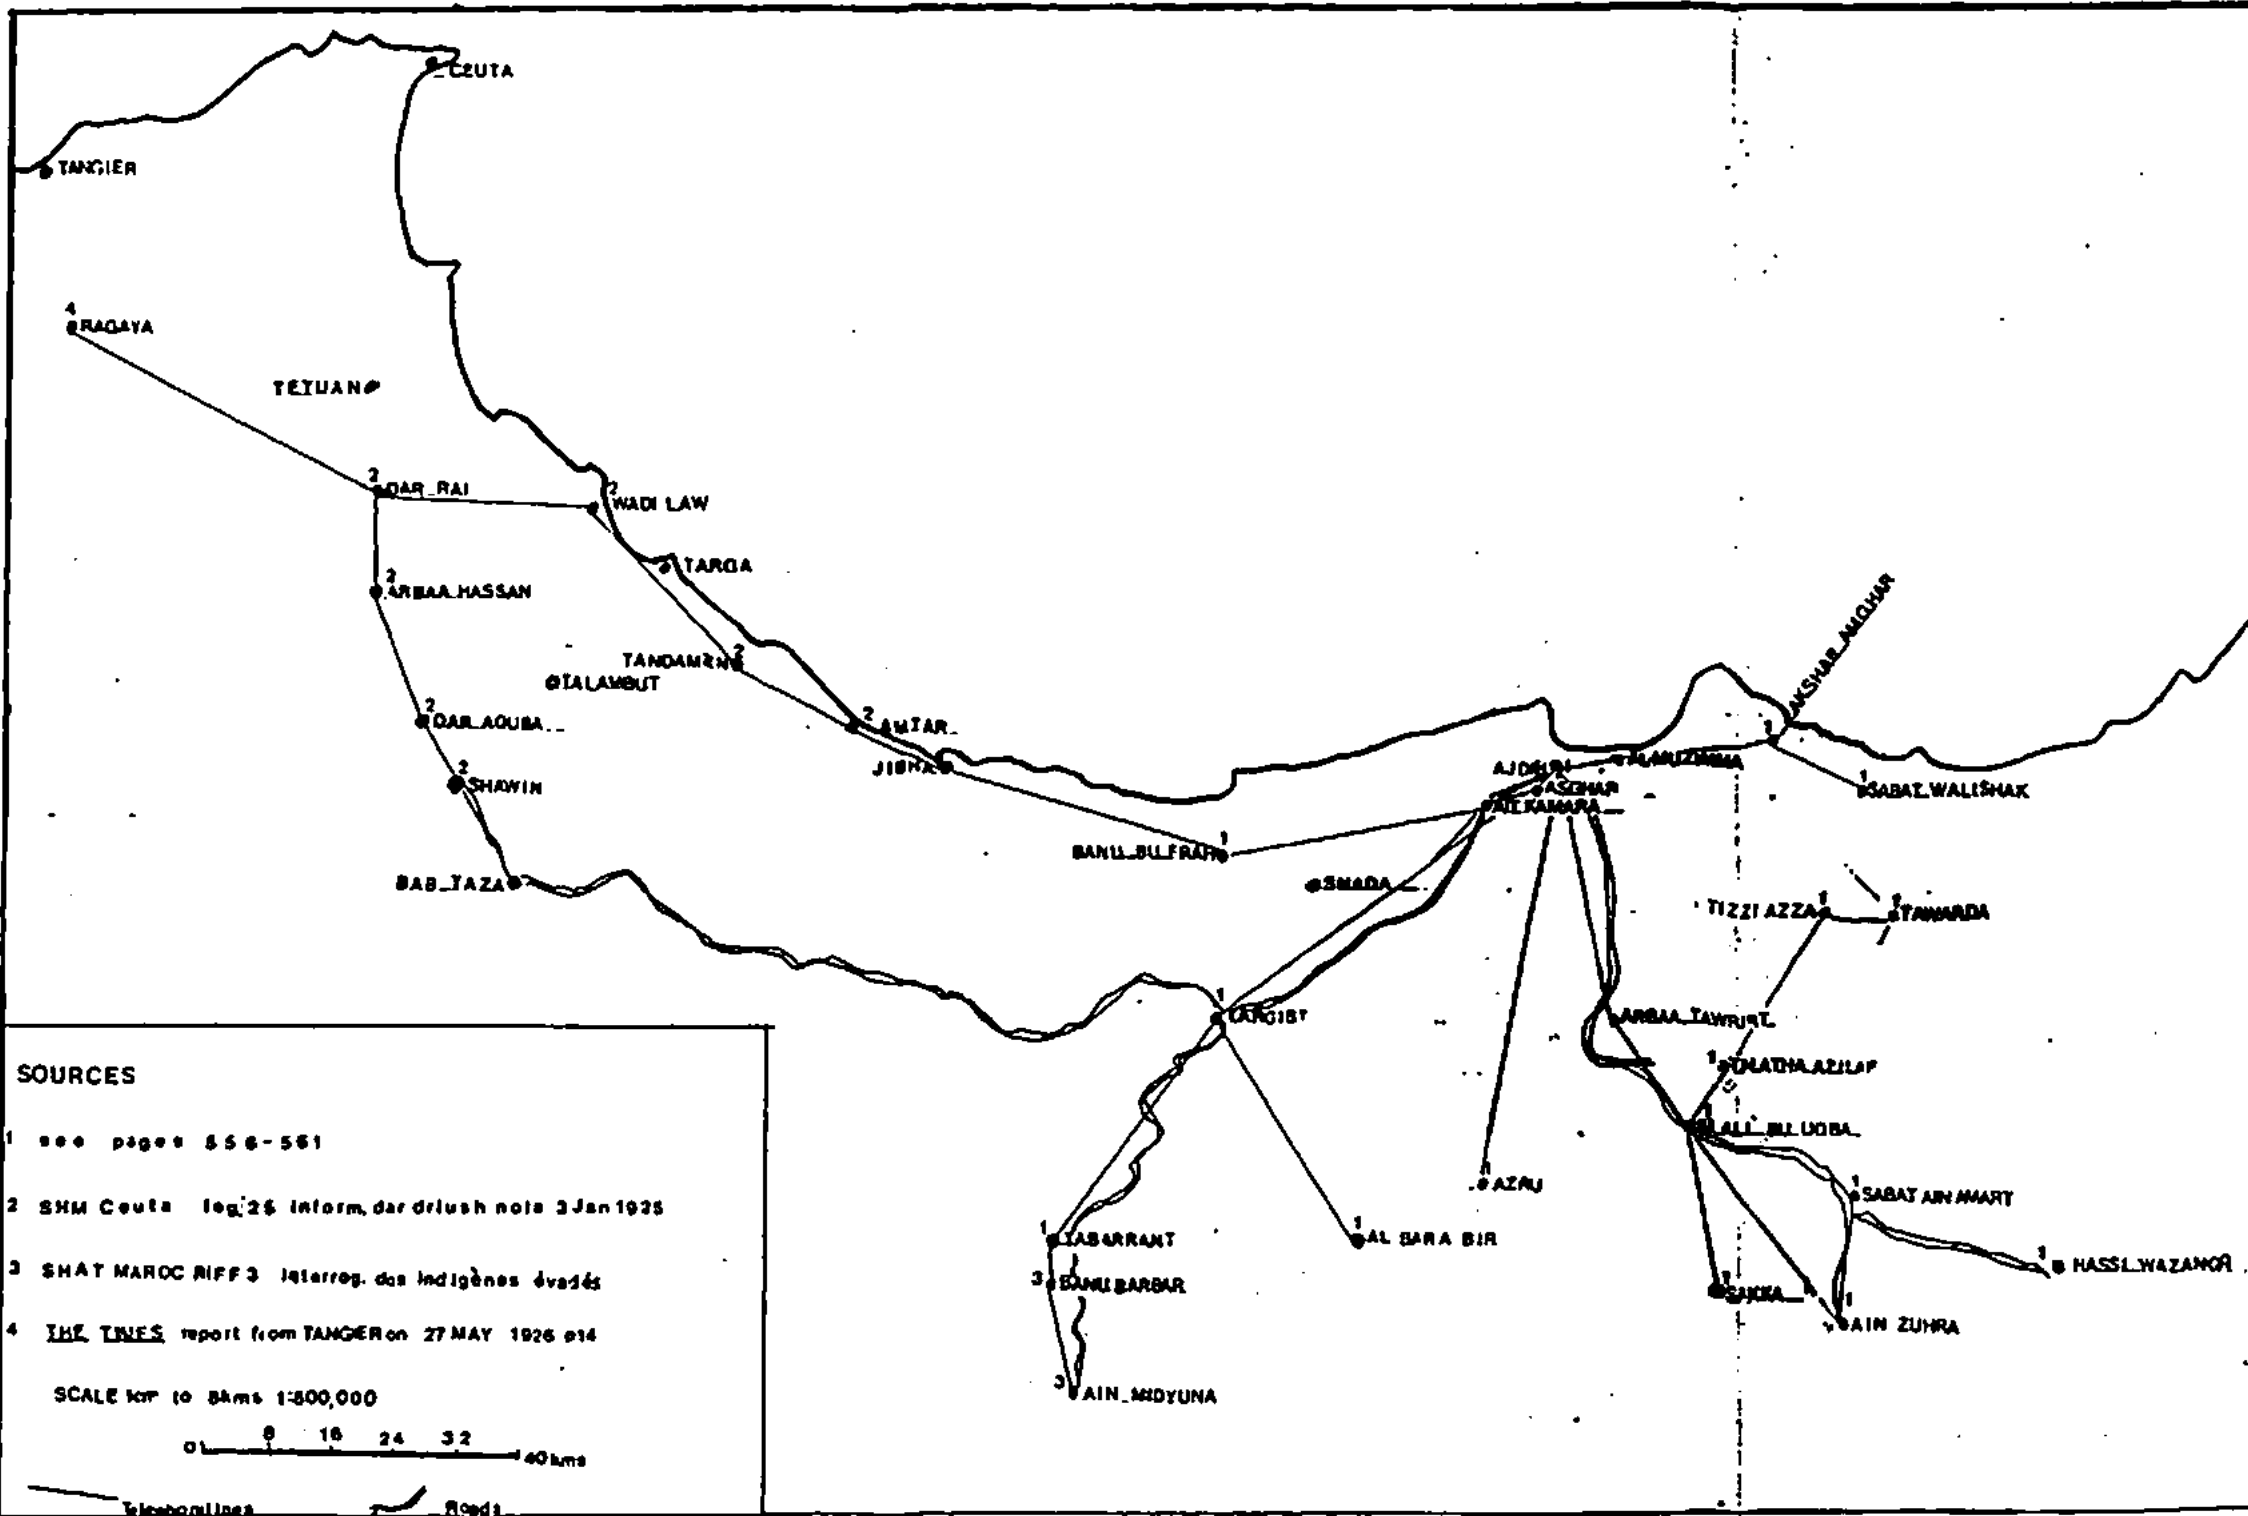

² Al-Bū 'Ayyāshī, op. cit., Vol. II, p. 166.

³ MAEF, Maroc 520, Ṣadiq b. al-Shadlī to Maḥammad b. 'Abd al-Karīm, 21 Ramaḍān 1342/28 April 1924. This letter is reproduced in the Appendix (No. 9).

⁴ Ibid.

⁵ MAEF, Maroc 519, List of prisoners at Ajdīr, 30 Ramaḍān 1342/5 May 1924, prisoners nos. 50-86.

⁶ SHAT, Maroc Riff 3, I Interrogationes indigènes évadés du Riff, Tirraillieur Ahmed Zebboy, Nov. 1925, Bashir Agouf, Feb. 1926, and SHM Melilla Leg. 125, Informaciones diciembre, nota, 23 Dec. 1924.

SOURCES

- 1 see pages 556-561
- 2 SHM Ceuta leg. 26 Inform. dar drlush note 3 Jan 1925
- 3 SHAT MAROC RIFF 3 Interrog. des Indigènes évadés
- 4 THE LINES report from TANGER on 27 MAY 1926 p14

SCALE 1:500,000
 0 8 16 24 32 40 kms

Telephone Lines Roads

MAP IX:1 THE COMMUNICATIONS NETWORK OF THE RIF (ROADS AND TELEPHONES BUILT BY THE RIFIS 1923-1926)

The main road that was completed was from Ajdīr to Targīst and parts of it are still in use today as a track running parallel to the main Alhucemas to Shāwin road. The road was good enough for Azarqān to travel from Ajdīr to Targīst by car in 1924.¹ All the roads centred on Ajdīr, as was natural, and they eventually ran to Targīst, to Sī 'Alī Bū 'Uqba via Arba'a Tawrirt, to 'Ain Zuhra, and later to Sakka.² (See Photograph IX : 9.)

The other main means of communication was by telephone. As the Rīfī territory expanded after 1923, all the newly conquered areas were quickly linked by telephone lines with Ajdīr. The telephone system was the responsibility of Sī Maḥammad, who employed a number of small boys as operators who had been trained by a Spanish prisoner nicknamed "Antonio el Mecánico".³

The main problem in the creation of a telephone system was the supply of equipment--particularly of posts and wire. Some was purchased from the French in Algeria. In September 1923, Sī Maḥammad wrote to Azarqān to tell him: "I have paid about 2,000 pesetas to Ḥaddu [i.e., bin Ḥammu al-Kaḥal] so that he may buy telephone apparatus."⁴

Other equipment was simply stolen from the Spanish occupied zone. At the end of September 1923, the Spanish

¹ Skīraj, op. cit., p. 126.

² Al-Bū 'Ayyāshī, op. cit., vol. II, p. 166, and Jacques Ladreit de Lacharrière, Le Rêve d'Abd el-Krim Esquisse d'Histoire Marocaine (Paris, 1925), pp. 24-25.

³ Hart, Aith Waryaghar, p. 387. Antonio's full name was Antonio Rojano, and he seems to have been a fairly enthusiastic renegade, for his signature appears at the foot of a design he drew of a "mechanical boat" for the Rīfīs, conserved in MAEF, Maroc 520, p. 164.

⁴ MAEF Maroc 517, p. 139, Maḥammad al-Khaṭṭābī to Azarqān, 18 Ṣafar 1342/30 Sept. 1923.

Photograph IX : 9

The Rifi road between Ajdir and Targist today seen from the present main road between Alhucemas and Shāwin in the western Banū Waryaghal territory.

Source: taken by author, September 1977 reported that many of the telephone posts between Tizzī 'Azzā and Tafarsit had been removed and sold to bin 'Abd al-Karīm at a price of 25 pts each,¹ and in mid-October, bin 'Abd al-Karīm apparently offered to buy any wire that was stolen from the Spanish for his line from Tizzī 'Azzā to Sūq al-Thalāthā' of Azilāf.² These thefts continued and the Spanish complained in December 1924 that telephone wire was being stolen in order to sell it to bin 'Abd al-Karīm. Apparently the French also suffered from this new industry, for a rumour circulated at the same time that they had offered to sell the Rīfī amīn at Sakka, in the Gaznaya, all the telephone wire that he needed provided that their wire was not stolen.³

The lines connected Ajdīr with all the main Rīfī positions--with Sūq al-Sabat of the Banū Walishak via Akshāb Amghār, with 'Ain Zuhra via Sī 'Alī Bū Ruqba, with 'Azrū, with Banū Bū Frāḥ,⁴ with Sakka, with Aknūl, with Tawārda, with Shāwin via Targīst, and with al-Barābir,⁵ and other lines were added when the Jibāla was occupied (Map IX:1).

Social Organisation: Health and Education in the Rīf Republic

In a society at war, like the Rīf, there was

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 23, Información Septiembre, Resumen General, 25 Sept. 1923.

² SHM Melilla Leg. 23, Información Octubre, Resumen General de Confidencias, 19 Oct. 1923.

³ SHM Melilla, Leg. 25, Información Diciembre, nota. 15 Dec. 1924.

⁴ SHM Melilla Leg. 24, Información Abril, Resumen General, 7 Apr. 1924, and Resumen General, 10 Apr. 1924, and SHM Melilla Leg. 25, Información Junio, nota, 27 June 1924, and Información Marzo, Resumen General, 26 Mar. 1924.

⁵ Ladreit de Lacharrière, op. cit., pp. 24-25.

obviously a considerable problem with casualties. Yet medical services were practically non-existent. What there were, were administered by a negro pharmacist (from Tangier or Fez) named Maḥbūb, but he had no proper hospital nor medical supplies. To a certain extent, men injured in battle were cared for by their wives, who often followed them to the front. Maḥbūb apparently made some attempt to train these women by lecturing their husbands in the hope that they would pass the information on to their wives.¹

Strenuous efforts were made to attract outside help--a French medical mission did enter the Rif in 1923, and the Red Cross and Red Crescent tried to send help.² At least one British Red Cross worker, a Norwegian named Dr. Walter Hutyens, did get to the Rif to help, and was captured in 1926 by the Spanish.³

Efforts were also made by Indian Muslims to send medical help to the Rifis--in March 1924, the French Consul-General in Calcutta complained to the government of India about the activities of one Mohammed ben Abdel Kader Hilali, who "has travelled the whole length of India for propaganda in favour of the Riffians."⁴

¹ Al-Bū 'Ayyāshī, op. cit., Vol. II, p. 181, and personal information, Idrīs Khaṭṭābī (bin 'Abd al-Karīm's younger son), Sept. 1077. According to Idrīl al-Khaṭṭābī, Maḥbūb died fairly recently in Tangier, where he had set up as a dentist.

² Al-Bū 'Ayyāshī, op. cit., Vol. II, p. 182.

³ There is voluminous correspondence on the case of Dr. Hutyens in MAEE, Leg. R966, Ex.13, Sospechosos en Marruecos viajes, Detenciones, e.g., Nota Verbal, Legation de Norvège to Ministerio de Estado, Madrid, 5 Oct. 1926 (letter) Secretario General Ministerio de Estado to Sr. Presidente Consejo de Ministros (Direccion de Marruecos y Colonias), Madrid, 7 Oct. 1926, Nota Verbal, Ministerio de Estado to Legación de Noruega, Madrid, 30 October 1926.

⁴ FO 371/11081/240/W8609, Laronce (French Consul-General) to Secretary to Government of India, Foreign and Political Department, Calcutta, 27 Mar. 1925.

Hilali apparently wished to set up a "sanitary formation" under Dr. Mohammed Naim. This mission was abandoned,¹ but another call for medical aid came in an Indian paper, The Muslim Outlook on 7 May 1925. The article, entitled "What the Riffians need", revealed that they grew enough food, had plenty of men and arms, but they were desperate for trained surgeons and medicines.² This help did not arrive either.

Another major preoccupation of the new state was education. Bin 'Abd al-Karīm himself designed a curriculum for the madrasa that was set up in Ajdir, which included mathematics, science, and "military science". This school was put under the charge of Sayyid Muḥammad b. al-Ḥājj Ḥaddu, a faqīh from Azghār. Another school was set up at the zawiya of Adduz in the Buqquya under a Ghumāri faqīh named Sidī Muḥammad Mashabbal, and, when the Rifis occupied Shāwin, a religious institution was started there under the Faqīh al-'Amārtī. Furthermore, bin 'Abd al-Karīm ordered that mathematics be taught in all the schools and also ordered the ṭālibs to confine themselves to teaching their charges the necessary Qur'anic studies--with the implication that they should cease to supplement their income by having the boys stitch jillābas.³ Bin 'Abd al-Karīm also prepared a group of 100 boys from each clan of the Banū Waryaghāl to go to Constantinople to study subjects such as engineering and medicine, but it never left.¹

¹ FO 371/11081/240/W8609, Parsons (Deputy Secretary, Foreign and Political Department) to Laronce, Delhi, 29 Apr. 1925.

² FO 371/11081/240/W8609, Parsons to Laronce, Simla, 13 Aug. 1925, enclosing copy of article from The Muslim Outlook, 7 May 1925.

³ Al-Bū 'Ayyāshī, op. cit., Vol. II, p. 185, and Hart, Aith Waryaghār, p. 389.

Finally, in an effort to recruit teachers, bin 'Abd al-Karīm inserted an advertisement in the Algiers paper Lisān al-Dīn in 1922, calling for teachers. This advertisement received no replies.²

Taxation and Finance

Any state needs to ensure that it has enough money to cover its expenditure. Unfortunately detailed accounts of income and expenditure are not available. However, al-Bū 'Ayyāshī gives what he says was the expenditure for the first six months of 1923:

Table IX: 3

Expenditure of Rifi Government, 1924 (first half)³

Army	311,165.00	pts
Pay of officials	221,936.75	pts
General	200.00	pts
Total	533,301.75	pts

According to al-Bū 'Ayyāshī also, the total income for the whole year was 6 million pesetas, which leaves a very large surplus.⁴

¹ SHM Melilla, Leg. 25, Información Confidentes, Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Qādir al-Faḥsī, 28 Feb. 1924, and personal information, Idrīs al-Khaṭṭābī, Sept. 1977. Idrīs al-Khaṭṭābī says that the intention was to send the group, which included 'Abd al-Karīm Bū Drā, to Egypt rather than Constantinople.

² Abderrahman Youssoufi, "Les Institutions de la République du Rif", in Colloque, pp. 95-96, and personal information, Idrīs al-Khaṭṭābī, Sept. 1977. Lisān al-Dīn was formerly edited by Sī Ḥassan b. 'Abd al-'Azīz now one of bin 'Abd al-Karīm's secretaries. "Maghzen Riffain", p. 5.

³ Al-Bū 'Ayyāshī, op. cit., Vol. II, pp. 153-154.

⁴ Ibid., p. 154.

The main resources of the treasury were the ransom paid for the Spanish prisoners in 1923--4 million pesetas, fines imposed on recalcitrant tribes, such as those on the Akhmās in the Jibāla in 1924--20,000 pts, on the Banū Zarwāl in 1925--50,000 pts, and on the Ghumāra in 1923--30,000 pts, and in addition to these irregular, if extremely productive, sources of revenue there were two more consistent ones--taxation and customs duties. According to al-Bū 'Ayyāshī again, the product of zakāt on income from harvests and from trade was 75,000 pesetas a year, while the revenue from customs duties or trade between the Rīf and the French zone was relatively little.¹

These figures are possibly misleading for they imply an entirely monetary payment of taxation. In fact, the payment was often made in kind. In January 1924, the people of 'Ain Zuhra were taxed at the rate of one animal from each 40 donkeys or goats and 2 pesetas on each box of sugar that was sold.² Taxes were also imposed at a flat rate for each individual in a particular area; for instance, in March 1924 bin 'Abd al-Karīm ordered that each person in each tribe was to pay 10 pesetas in order to purchase aeroplanes.³ In January 1924, a Spanish agent in the Banū Bū Zrā reported that the Rīf commander in the district "imposed on them a tax of [15 pts] for each house and now he is ordering them to give one mudd of barley."⁴

¹ Ibid., pp. 152-153. Al-Bū 'Ayyāshī says the customs duties were low, but then goes on to say that they mounted to 5,000 pts a day (over 180,000 pts a year), which is presumably a misprint.

² SHM Melilla Leg. 25, Información Batel, 1924, nota, 18 Jan. 1924.

³ SHM Melilla Leg. 25, Información Confidentes, Sidi Idrīs b. al-Bashīr (Gaznaya), 26 Mar. 1924.

⁴ SHM Ceuta Leg. 21, Bajalato de Gumara, Khalifa of Banū Bū Zrā to Castro Girona, 14 Jan. 1924.

Such exactions did not of course please the Ghumārīs and the same informant wrote in February 1924 to complain that they "are in dire straits from the great amount of contributions they are forced to give, and from hunger and so on."¹ A flat rate land-tax was imposed in the same way, at 5 pts a hectare, which would also be used for buying munitions, it was announced.²

The taxes were paid in Spanish or Ḥassanī or French currency, for despite the printing of a number of bank notes in a new Rīfī currency (rifiyāt) for a State bank of the Rīf (Bank Ḥukūmat al-Rīf), tied to French and English currency, they were never put into circulation and the State Bank was never set up.³ Several sources state that these notes were printed in the United Kingdom under the auspices of Captain Gardiner, who was involved in the supply of arms to the Rīf and in making propaganda in Europe in the Rīfī cause.⁴

The Sharī'a

The changes that have so far been described were designed to help in the organisation of the new Rīfī state and to create a social and administrative system that would

¹ Ibid., Khalīfa of Banū Bū Zrā to Castro Girona, 1 Rajab 1342/7 Feb. 1924.

² SHM Melilla Leg. 24, Información Abril, Resumen General, 13 Apr. 1924.

³ Al-Bū 'Ayyāshī, op. cit., Vol. II, pp. 154-155. Hart, Aith

⁴ Ibid., and Goded, op. cit., p. 93. However, Waryathar, p. 376. Minister in Constantinople in 1924 was concerned that these notes might have been printed in Turkey, MAEE/M.D.E. Antiquo Archivo Político, 2543, Información Octubre. Gardiner, a former officer in the British army, had a commercial interest in Morocco and set himself up as a roving ambassador for the Rīfī state, based in London. See below, p. 807.

enable the state to oppose the Spanish. This was one of the objectives laid down by the bay'a given to bin 'Abd al-Karīm. Connected with this organised system was the need to impose order in the Rif; however, the imposition of order, and the sharī'a also helped to fulfil one of the other objectives which the bay'a document had in mind.

"May God destroy heresies and error through this man"¹ it said, referring to bin 'Abd al-Karīm. This was his own desire as well.

In order to carry out the policy of imposing order, the Ministry of Justice was fairly well organised. At its head, in theory, was the Faqīh Bū Laḥya. However, he was frequently engaged in military operations of various sorts and a great deal of the daily administration fell to the Faqīh al-Shargī of the Banū Tūzīn, and to Muḥammad b. 'Amar 'Abdallah al-Timsamānī. These three men were the main implementers of the policy of imposing the sharī'a.² It is very difficult indeed to distinguish between which of them was in fact in charge of the Ministry at any one time-- although Hart gives them control in the order al-Shargī, al-Timsamānī and Bū Laḥya.³ However, as will be shown, both al-Shargī and Bū Laḥya were involved in ensuring order and bringing the sharī'a into force at the same time. A French report states that al-Shargī was more concerned with civil law, while 'Abdallah Bū Drā was a deputy minister for criminal affairs.⁴ Certainly, in the light of the prison records

¹ MAEF, Maroc 517, p. 180, Proclamation of Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Karīm, dated 14 Jumāda II 1341/2 Feb. 1923.

² "Maghzen Riffain", pp. 3, 4, and Hart, Aith Waryaghar, p. 378.

³ Ibid.

⁴ "Maghzen Riffain", p. 4.

examined in the next section civil law would seem to have been al-Shargī's main area of concern.

Of course, the enforcement of order had a strong political reason as well as the religious one dictated by the sharī'a, for, as we have seen, unity could only be maintained while there was peace. Thus there was a major attack on the system of blood feuds. Bin 'Abd al-Karīm declared the death sentence for murderers and this was frequently carried out. A case of murder in March 1926 was punished in this way and the written judgement sums up the attitude of the new state towards murderers. The case was one in which two men agreed with the wife of a third to murder her husband. Statements were taken from a number of witnesses and from those involved, and one of them was condemned to death:

"Praise be to God.

(The quilt)

of Ahmad b. 'Alī, the above-mentioned [i.e., in the statements from witnesses] has been proved. He is responsible for shedding the blood of his brother Muslim, who had emigrated in the cause of God [i.e., had left the French-occupied zone for the Rif], 'Amar b. Ahmad al-Wanjilī, who was protected from the law of blood feud (ma'ṣūm) because God, may He be exalted, forbade the killing of a believer, a man who has made a covenant without reason. And he has ordained that a killer should be killed as a discouragement to killing, so that killing [a murderer] should be a punishment that reduces the number of murders . . ."¹

There are two themes here; firstly, that God has forbidden murder and therefore it must be punished in order to uphold the law, and secondly that the execution of a murderer will discourage others from committing the same crime. Murderers had been liable to be shot before, of course, but now it no longer seen as a personal right to kill a murderer, for that duty had been taken over by the representatives of the state. In other words, a crime was no longer a crime against an individual but against the law of God, and its punishment was removed from the individual and taken over by the state. People had, of course, been punished by the community before the Rif Republic, but the penalties laid down were fines, collected by the amghār,¹ and which depended to a large extent on a consensus of opinion, rather than the death penalty, which could only be imposed by a state system which was above the normal politics of the tribe. This was explicitly stated in the judgement of Aḥmad b. 'Alī which made it clear that "the pardon of the relatives of the dead man . . . is not valid . . . because the death penalty for [murder] is one of the laws of God which may not be set aside."² Thus the authority of the state in this matter had the full support of the sharī'a. The old forms of justice were specifically set aside.

¹ MAEF, Maroc 519, p. 45, statements of witnesses in the case of Ahmad b. 'Alī, and on reverse his condemnation to death for murder, signatures illegible, 25 Sha'bān 1344/10 Mar. 1926. This document is reproduced in the Appendix (No. 10).

This emphasis on the authority of the state is expressed in the legislation issued by bin 'Abd al-Karīm's administration. A decree signed by the qā'id mashawar (roughly Chancellor) in the Rifī Government, 'Abd al-Karīm (bin Ḥaddu) b. Ziyyān, in March 1926, laid down the fines to be paid by members of the ḥarkas (not the regular army) who were absent without leave. It ended: "This is an order emanating from the fortunate Makhzan. May God protect it. . . . By order of 'Abd al-Karīm b. Ziyyān [sic]."³

¹ See above, pp. 123-124.

² MAEF, Maroc 519, p. 45, Condemnation to death of Aḥmad b. 'Alī, 25 Sha'bān 1344/10 Mar. 1926.

³ Hart, Emilio Blanco, II, pp. 34-1342.

Another decree, giving a particular family exemption from taxation, in October 1922, was simply signed by bin 'Abd al-Karīm himself.¹ This is a great contrast with the qānūns issued before the Rif Republic, signed and counter-signed by numerous shaykhs and amghārs.²

The sharī'a, of course, had always tended to increase the power of the Sultan, and bin 'Abd al-Karīm was most concerned that the sharī'a should prevail in the Rif. He therefore attempted to remove most of the characteristics of customary law. He forbade the collective oath by which an accused man could call on his allies and family to swear with him that he had not committed the crime of which he was accused. Henceforth, only the accused man was allowed to swear and that in the mosque on the Qur'ān. As David Hart points out, this measure, like so many of those of bin 'Abd al-Karīm, had both a religious and a political effect. It at once reinforced the authority of the sharī'a and furthermore broke down family solidarity as a political force.³ The attack on blood feuds also diminished the power of the liff system, which could so easily have united factions against his rule. This was vital, because although bin 'Abd al-Karīm had used his marriage to a woman from the Murābiṭīn to win the support of that clan of his own tribe, the new nation which he now ruled stretched far beyond the old boundaries of any liff system and took in the Ghumāra and Sinhāja regions as well.⁴

Not all the penalties of the sharī'a were imposed,

¹ Ibid., p. 342.

² See above, p. 127.

³ Hart, Aith Waryaghar, p. 382.

⁴ Ibid., pp. 382-383.

however. There was no mutilation for thieves, for example --they were fined. A decree for the Gaznaya in 1925 laid down that the theft of vegetables, nuts, fruits or grain would be punished with a fine of 6 pesetas or a week in prison.¹ However, the Qur'anic punishment was threatened in certain circumstances.²

Prisons were undoubtedly the greatest legal innovation in the Rif Republic, and they were used not only for ordinary criminal offences and for "crimes against the State" such as spying, but also for social crimes such as refusal to repay debts, to keep oaths, and for general bad conduct such as scandal-mongering. (The effects of this policy will be examined in the next section.)

Beyond these crimes, bin 'Abd al-Karim went even further into the realm of private conduct, making it mandatory for everyone, even the women, to pray five times a day. Penalties were fairly severe; men who did not pray were sent to the harka on the front for between fifteen and twenty days, and women were fined a chicken.³

It will be seen, however, that the term "law" went far beyond the limited ideas of the shari'a. The shari'a was primarily concerned with criminal and civil law --in short with questions of violence and the ownership of property, and there were whole areas of legal activity in a modern state which it did not touch--the ordered running of markets, for example, and above all, in the case of the Rif, the problems presented by the particular needs of the security of the state from spying and political subversion, on the one hand, and the need, which was felt in particular by Bū Lahya and al-Shargī, to reform the general conduct of the people. It is therefore necessary to examine the workings of the Rīfī legal system in some detail.

¹ Ibid., p. 389.

² See below, p. 729.

³ Hart, Aith Waryaghar, p. 389.

Arrests for Political Reasons

Throughout 1923 and 1924, people were arrested by bin 'Abd al-Karīm's representatives--qā'ids, the army guards, qāḍis--and as a result of his own instructions. As we have seen, bin 'Abd al-Karīm, ever since the beginning of the war, had arrested individuals for political reasons--because they were too favourable towards the Spanish, or to ensure their loyalty. This continued after his proclamation: Qā'id Salah of the Banū Walishak and his khalīfa, 'Allāl b. al-Ḥājj Qaddur were arrested for a short time at the beginning of February 1923.¹ This sort of political intimidation continued. During the efforts to take control of the Ghumāra in December 1923, thirty men were despatched from the Rīfī base at Tandaman to arrest a certain Sī Muḥammad b. Qaddur. Their quarry, however, escaped with his family to the mountains the night before the arrival of the soldiers, who, in place of arresting him, destroyed his house and took his goats--although he had managed to take his cows with him to the mountains.²

Fighting against the Marnīsa produced another group of arrests... At the beginning of January 1924, Sī :

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 23, Información Febrero, Información del día, 8 Feb. 1923.

² SHM Ceuta Leg. 21, Bajalato de Ghumara, Sī Muḥammad b. al-Hashnu al-Mimūnī to 'Alī b. Sulaymān, 5 Jumāda I 1342/14 Dec. 1923.

Maḥammad was reported to be in the al-Marnīsa tribe, arresting everyone who went against his orders.¹

However, these political arrests were only part of the story. Many people were arrested for communication with the Spanish and spying, or on suspicion of such an offence. This, of course, is normal practice in any war. Bin 'Abd al-Karīm was kept informed of possible Spanish spies by his own internal network of informants. For instance, on 11 February 1924, his brother, Sī Maḥammad, received the following letter:

"Praise be to God alone. God's mercy and peace be upon our Lord Muḥammad, his family, and companions.

May God prolong the existence of our Lord, who has been made victorious by God, our Lord Maḥammad bin 'Abd al-Karīm al-Khaṭṭābī peace be upon you and God's mercy and blessing.

And to continue:

My Lord. Let it be known to you that Ḥidda Barka al-Timmittī who lives in Ushshān went out--and this is true--and went to Aḥmad bin Sīdī Ḥaddu and met him and Muḥammad bin 'Umar Ashshan, may God curse him, and he told him everything that happens in this area and told him of the aeroplane that our Lord has and described how it was white. He tells him about everything that goes on around here. In truth he is a spy. If anything happens to him it means that we are punished and not only him. This is what I have to tell our Lord.

And peace.

On 5 Rajab in the year 1342.

Qā'id Muḥammad b. Mīmūn al-Timmittī al-Sa'idī, may God give him success."²

It will be seen that such information may partly have been the result of fear of collective punishment. That at least is the implication behind the final line which says that the writer fears that not only the informant would be punished.

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 24, Informaciones, Resumen General, 4 Jan. 1924.

² MAEF, Maroc 519, p. 47, Muḥammad b. Mīmūn al-Tamaytī al-Sa'idī to Maḥammad b. 'Abd al-Karīm al-Khaṭṭābī, 5 Rajab 1342/11 Feb. 1924. The letter is reproduced in the Appendix (No. 11). The Rifis succeeded in buying an aeroplane through the medium of Ḥaddu b. Ḥammu in Algeria. It was piloted by a European but only made one flight before Spanish aeroplanes destroyed it. Goded, op. cit., p. 102.

The penalties for spying could be very heavy. There are numerous accounts of the death penalty being meted out to spies and other traitors. One of David Hart's Gaznayī informants described the penalty imposed on a man found carrying messages to the French after hostilities with their zone broke out in 1925. He was bound hand and foot, weighted with a large stone and thrown into the sea, where he allegedly stayed for fifteen days before dying.¹ A brother of Ḥaddu b. Ḥammu al-Kaḥal was discovered trying to free Spanish prisoners and was shot,² and six men from the Murābiṭīn clan of the Banū Waryaghāl, one possessed of baraka, were stoned to death in the Sunday market of Tisar on the orders of bin 'Abd al-Karīm.³

Other crimes also merited the death penalty. Faqīr Sī Ḥaddu of the Banū Bū 'Ayyāsh had been amīn in Tafarsit in 1921 and responsible, like Ḥaddu b. Ḥammu al-Kaḥal in Dār Driūsh, for forwarding the supplies the Spanish had left there to the central Rif. Evidently he did not send all the supplies, for when his home was searched in July 1923, some 20 cases of ammunition were discovered. On bin 'Abd al-Karīm's instructions, he was shot.⁴

These executions for serious offences were complemented by terms of imprisonment for those who had committed

¹ Hart, Aith Waryaghar, p. 388.

² Ibid., p. 381, and al-Bū 'Ayyāshī, op. cit., Vol. II, p. 150.

³ Hart, Aith Waryaghar, p. 381.

⁴ SHM Melilla Leg. 23, Información Julio, Ḥamid b. al-Ḥājj, 13 July 1923.

lesser offences or whose guilt was only suspected.

Imprisonment

Prisons were, of course, an innovation in the Rif, but they quickly became a part of every-day life. Large numbers of people were imprisoned--mostly for fairly short periods--during the Rif Republic, and the largest prison camp of all--at Takhrusit, between Ajdīr and what is now the town of al-Ḥusayma--was reserved, not for Spanish prisoners of war, but for Rifī prisoners.¹ In September 1924, Spanish Military Intelligence estimated that bin 'Abd al-Karīm had 800 "native" prisoners in Ajdīr²--although many of these may have been Spanish native troops captured in the Jibāla.

Fortunately, bin 'Abd al-Karīm's officials kept registers of the names of prisoners, their crimes, and the time for which they had been in the prison--not, it must be stressed, of the length of time for which they had been sentenced. Some of these registers, covering 1923 and 1924, have been preserved.³

The first register that is available is for a prison at Tawrīrt in the southern Banū Waryaghāl, dated 20 Rabī' II 1342/30 November 1923.⁴ Unfortunately this, the only register from Tawrīrt, is the least informative. However, a number of interesting things do emerge. The register would seem to have been made in rather a hurry--it is very

¹ Al-Bū 'Ayyāshī, op. cit., Vol. II, p. 144.

² SHM Melilla Leg. 25, Información Septiembre, nota, 8 Sept. 1924.

³ A typical register is reproduced in the Appendix (No. 12).

⁴ MAEF, Maroc 519, p. 145, List of prisoners at Tawrīrt in the maḥakma of Targīst, 20 Rabī' II 1340/30 Nov. 1923.

scrappily written and disorganised in comparison with the registers from Ajdīr--and is really just a list of names. In all but a very few cases the offence for which the prisoners were arrested is not established. Whoever made the list confined himself to asking the prisoners themselves, and not surprisingly they nearly all claimed that they had no idea why they were imprisoned and they had been wronged. The claim that pasha or 'āmil or qā'id so-and-so "arrested me and wronged me" recurs many times. The exceptions to this are a group of 38 Sinhājīs including a pasha, a qā'id 100, 2 qā'ids 50, and 2 qā'ids 25, arrested for the theft of military supplies,¹ a man from the Banū Zarwāl who "killed a man he found with his sister,"² and a pasha and his khalīfa from the Fannāssa who explained their offence thus:

"When the enemy of God, Aḥmad b. Maḥammad, stayed in his [the pasha's] house the khalīfa sent a note to the pasha telling him that an enemy of God was staying in his house and when the mujāhidīn heard that . . . the Qā'id Muḥammad Azdād al-Rifī : arrested him [i.e., the pasha]."³

Finally, two men from the Matīwa al-Jabal explained that "our 'āmil arrested us . . . and he thought that we were opposed to him."⁴ In fact, the vast majority of the 132 prisoners were arrested by either the mujāhidīs or the 'āmilīs or by a pasha. This did not mean that holders of these positions were themselves immune from arrest, for the list includes among the prisoners 5 pashas, 2 qā'ids 100, 2 qā'ids 50 and 3 qā'ids 25. It seems quite likely, therefore, that since this was the period of the expansion into

¹ Ibid., note on prisoners nos. 1-38.

² Ibid., prisoner no. 133.

³ Ibid., prisoners nos. 116 and 117.

⁴ Ibid., prisoners nos. 58 and 59.

the Sinhāja, most of those arrested were arrested for political offences. Certainly they were nearly all from the immediate area, as Table IX: 4 shows.

It will be seen that apart from the Sinhājīs already mentioned, the other large group came from the Marnīsa, the result of the struggle against 'Amār b. Ḥamīdu, for they are nearly all listed as being from the jurisdiction of 'Abd al-Salām al-Yidrī who was bin 'Abd al-Karīm's qā'id in the area.¹ Furthermore, most of them appear to have been very recent arrests--the length served by the Marnīsīs and Sinhājīs is not given--but the rest, the majority, had been imprisoned for less than one month (see Table IX: 5).

The Ajdīr Prison

The prisoners of the Ajdīr prison are considerably better documented. There exist five registers dated 17 Jumāda I 1342/26 December 1923,² 17 Jumāda II 1342/25 January 1924,³ 1 Rajab 1342/17 February 1924,⁴ 27 Ramaḍān 1342/2 May 1924,⁵ and 30 Ramaḍān 1342/5 May 1924.⁶

During the period 26 December 1923 to 5 May 1924, that is, less than five months, a total of at least 281 individuals passed through the Adjīr prison. Certainly a number of these were, once again, people captured during the fighting with 'Amār b. Ḥamīdu--which explains the high figures

¹ Ibid., prisoners nos. 66-70, 80, 90-105.

² MAEF, Maroc 519, pp. 143, 144, List of prisoners in the capital of Ajdīr, 17 Jumāda I 1342/26 Dec. 1923.

³ Ibid., p. 142. Unfortunately, this document was not well photographed on microfilm, and is partially illegible. It has therefore been excluded from all numerical tables.

⁴ Ibid., pp. 134, 139.

⁵ Ibid., p. 146.

⁶ Ibid., p. 147.

for the Marnisa, and those of the Banū Walīd and Banū Wanjīl, in February 1924 (see Table IX: 6).

What is interesting about these figures is the relatively low number of people from the Banū Waryaghāl in comparison with those from other tribes, particularly the Banū Tūzīn, when it is remembered that the prison of Ajdīr was situated within the territory of the Banū Waryaghāl. For, although 31 prisoners seems high, the reason that this is so is that the Banū Waryaghāl prisoners tended to stay in prison for only a short time. This is in fact true of nearly all the prisoners--there are only 14 out of the 241 prisoners whose names occur in the registers right through from December to May, and not one of them is from the Banū Waryaghāl (see Table IX: 7)

A possible reason for this is indicated by the offences for which people were imprisoned. Of the 14 long-serving prisoners in Ajdīr in May 1924, no less than 7 were imprisoned because they were suspected of spying, 2 were former Spanish soldiers, and 2 were suspected of murder. (See Table IX: 8.) Those found guilty were often executed.

It is hardly surprising that suspected spying was most frequent among the tribes immediately bordering on the Spanish zones--in the Banū Sa'īd, Banū Walīshak, and the exiled Qal'ayīs in the east and the Ghumāran tribes and the Banū Sa'īd al-Jabal in the west. The high incidence of violence--fighting and murder--in the Banū Waryaghāl and Banū Tūzīn is also scarcely surprising, particularly in the case of the former tribe, with its reputation for feuding.

The most frequent crimes, according to the prison records, were ones of threatening the state's security, or of violence (see Table IX: 9) but much the most interesting developments are the cases of social and "religious" crimes. Probably for the first time in the Rif, people were expected to behave in a responsible way with regard to the community and in accordance with the sharī'a, even in their personal affairs. The main proponent of this policy would appear to have been the Minister of Justice, the Faqīh al-Shargī and Bū Laḥya of the Banū Tūzīn. On a number of occasions, al-Shargī is reported to have sent people to prison "for reasons of the beloved shar'"--such was the case of two men from the Banū Walishak in December 1923,¹ and a man from the Timsamān was sent by Bū Laḥya for the same reason at the same time.² Unfortunately in these cases the actual offence is not stated. However, in February 1924 the offences of other miscreants are spelled out more clearly. Muḥammad b. Sha'ib b. 'Umar b. 'Umar of the Banū Waryaghāl had spent nearly a month in prison, having been sent there by al-Shargī "because of a woman, the daughter of b. al-Tāhīr Aztūt, whom he promised to marry, without it being valid in the shar'."³ Qāḍī al-Shargī sent another Waryaghālī to prison because he had failed to pay a debt. By February this man had spent 3 months and 8 days in prison.⁴

As well as offences which directly contravened the sharī'a, the judicial officers also intervened in matters of personal conduct. The records for January 1924 record the imprisonment of "Allūsh al-Mashādi, arrested on the

¹ Ibid., pp. 143-144, prisoners nos. 52 and 53.

² Ibid., prisoner no. 14.

³ Ibid., pp. 138-139, prisoner no. 8.

⁴ Ibid., prisoner no. 10.

authorization of the Faqīh b. 'Alī [i.e., Bū Laḥya] because of the length of his tongue and the frequency with which he says ugly things."¹

They also interfered in people's domestic affairs. A man from the Banū Sa'id (near Melilla) was sent to prison by Bū Laḥya because "he hit his wife and knocked a tooth out of her face."² Punishment by authority for wife beating was doubtless a new experience for the Rifis. However, although the authorities do seem to have tried to some extent to help to protect women, they were also careful to protect the "honour" of their husbands, presumably partly to prevent fighting and feuding. In December 1923 a man from the Banū Mazdūī was imprisoned because "Sīdī al-Ḥassan b. al-Bū Nāṣirī suspected him of doing something with his wife,"³ and certainly it was possible to claim, as the Banū Zarwālī imprisoned at Tawrīrt had done, that he had killed a man he had found with his wife, as an excuse for his crime.

The government was not averse to imprisoning women either. In Tawrīrt, 6 women, with 10 children, were imprisoned, although they were not accorded the dignity of being numbered in the register. In May 1924 two women were imprisoned, one on suspicion of spying, the other on suspicion "of killing her husband" and her female companion by night.⁴

Violence was, of course, a major social problem in the new state. Thus, on 2 May 1924, a man was imprisoned

¹ Ibid., p. 142 (prisoners not numbered).

² Ibid., pp. 138-139, prisoner no. 77.

³ Ibid., pp. 143-144, prisoner no. 55.

⁴ Ibid., p. 146, prisoners nos. 129, 130.

for killing a man in the market.¹ Another, from the Banū Aḥmad, for killing a man in self-defence.² A shaykh from the al-Maṭālsa was arrested and "declared that he killed a woman and the bullet came out of her and hit a man, and he died."³ An 'Amārtī had killed a man who was a guest in his house one night,⁴ and so on. In February 1923, a man from the Banū Waryaghal was arrested on the word of a woman who said that she had let him into her house to kill her husband and his second wife.⁴

There was, of course, the ever present possibility that these killings might develop into feuding, as in the case of three men from the al-Maṭālsa tribe who had spent some four months in prison by 26 December 1923 "for awakening the fire of disorder when the son of Aḥmad Aqudād was killed."⁶ For this reason, some of the murders for which people were detained went back some time. Sometime towards the beginning of November, for on 26 December he had been detained for nearly two months, one Ḥaddu b. Idrīs of the Banū Tūzīn was arrested "on suspicion of killing a man . . . at night two years ago,⁷ although it appears from later registers that this alleged offence was committed at the time of Anwāl.⁸ The effect of imprisoning a murder suspect, as well as serving as a warning to others, and punishing him for his presumed crime, was of course to make the continuance

¹ Ibid., prisoner no. 139.

² Ibid., prisoner no. 137.

³ Ibid., prisoner no. 141.

⁴ Ibid., prisoner no. 143.

⁵ Ibid., pp. 138-139, prisoner no. 12.

⁶ Ibid., pp. 143-144, prisoners nos. 34, 35, 36.

⁷ Ibid., prisoner no. 23.

⁸ Ibid., p. 146, prisoner no. 26.

of a blood-feud quite impossible.

However, imprisonment was not the only penalty that was imposed. Fines were another possibility, and people were released in exchange for fines. For instance, in May 1924, a Timsamānī suspected of murder was released on payment of 200 riyals,¹ and another Timsamānī who had gone to Melilla by night without permission was also released after payment of a fine.² Similarly, people were imprisoned for not paying fines. Again, in May 1924, a Tūzānī, Yakhlif b. Ḥammu al-‘Aqqīwī, and his friend Muḥ b. Muḥand Amziyyān, were fined 4,000 riyals because "they attended the killing of a man and a woman for adultery without the permission of the government."³ This is an affair which itself throws some light on relations between the population and the government, for assuming that it was the killing for adultery that was without the permission of the government (rather than attendance at the execution), it shows firstly that the government's aim was to limit such practices, and secondly that, on this occasion at least, it failed to do so.

The Market Inspector's Queries

There were, of course, lesser problems of order than those which ended in imprisonment. One of the objectives of the new ordered society that bin ‘Abd al-Karīm was trying to bring about was to avoid arguments and disagreements getting out of hand. One of the areas in which he evidently hoped to do this was in the markets, and he

¹ Ibid., prisoner no. 55.

² Ibid., prisoner no. 57.

³ Ibid., prisoner nl. 30.

Table IX: 4Origins of prisoners in Tawrirt on 30 November 1923

Sinhāja (unspecified tribes)	38
Fannāssa	2
Banū Bashīr	2
Banū Silmān	9
Banū Zarwāl	4
Marnīsa	25
Matīwa	3
Wazzānī Sharīf	1
Women	6
Children	10
Unidentified	32

Source: MAEF, Maroc 519, pp. 143, 144, List of prisoners in the capital of Ajdīr, 17 Jumāda I 1342/26 Dec. 1923.

Table IX: 5Lengths of prison terms served by prisoners in Tawrirt on 30 November 1923

Less than 1 month	34
1-2 months	4
2-3 "	1
3-4 "	2
4-7 "	-
7-8 "	1
8-10 "	-
10 months and more	1
Unspecified	89
of whom	25 were from Marnīsa 38 were from Sinhāja and 16 were women and children

Source: MAEF, Maroc 519, pp. 143, 144, List of prisoners in the capital of Ajdīr, 17 Jumāda I 1342/26 Dec. 1923

Table IX: 6Individuals arrested from each tribe in AjdirPrison 26 December 1923-5 May 1924

Banū Waryaghāl	31
Timsamān	7
Banū Tūzīn	47
Tafarsit	8
Banū 'Amārt	3
Matīwa al-Baḥar	7
Banū Sa'id al-Rīf (i.e., near Melilla)	11
Banū Walishak	7
Banū Yiṭṭuft	1
al-Maṭālsa	13
Buqquya	11
Banū Bū Frāḥ	1
Gaznaya	5
Zarqāt	2
Qal'aya	6
Banū Aḥmad	2
Banū Bū Slāma	2
Banū Wanjīl	4
Banū Walīd	5
Banū Sa'id al-Jabal (i.e., near Tetuan)	9
Ghumāra	25
Banū Mazdūī	1
Awlād Azain (?)	2
Marnīsa	68
Marrākish	1
Women	2
Total	281

Source: MAEF, Maroc 519, pp. 138-139, 143-144, 146-147.

Table IX: 7

Numbers of prisoners held for entire period
26 December 1923 to 5 May 1924 expressed as percentages

				‡
All tribes	14 out of 281 prisoners			59
Banū Tūzīn	2 " " 47	"		4
Ghumāra	6 " " 25	"		24
Matīwa al-Baḥar	1 " " 13	"		7
Tafarsit	1 " " 9	"		12.5
B. Sa'īd al-Rīf	2 " " 11	"		18
Timsamān	2 " " 7	"		28

Source: MAEF, Maroc 519, pp. 138-139, 143-144, 146-147.

Table IX: 8

List of prisoners, and crimes, held for entire period 26 December 1923 to May 1924 and total length of imprisonment to 5 May 1924

Banū Tūzīn

Ḥaddu b. Idrīs al-Yaḥyī : - suspicion of murder during Anwāl victory 7 m. 3 d.

al-Faqīr Salām b. al-Ḥassan al-Miḍārī - arrested by mujāhids 8 m. 18 d.

Matīwa al-Rīf

Al-Mufaḍḍal b. Muḥ : - suspicion communication with enemy 6 m. 8 d.

Tafarsit

al-Faqīr Ḥammādī b. Ṣadiq - "the spy" 12 m. 3 d.

Banū Sa'īd

Al-Tāhir b. Ḥaddu - unclear 6 m. 27 d.

Ḥammu b. Daddām - captured in battle 22 m. 3 d.

/cont'd

Timsamān

Ḥammādī b. Sha'ib	- suspicion of spying	8 m. 3 d.
Shaykh Tuhāmī Amghār	- suspicion of murder	12 m.

Banū Bū Zrā

Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Fāḍil	- suspicion of communication with Spain	9 m. 3 d.
Aḥmad b. Sīdī Muḥammad	- says he's innocent	6 m. 3 d.
al-Ḥassan b. al-'Arbī	- suspicion of communication with Spain	9 m. 3 d.

Banū Zīyyāt

al-Mufaḍḍal b. Zarnūn	- going to enemy zone	6 m. 18 d.
-----------------------	-----------------------	------------

Unidentified tribe in Ghumāra

Muḥammad b. Muḥammad b. al-'Ayyāshī	- ex-Spanish qā'id	6 m. 18 d.
-------------------------------------	---------------------------	------------

Banū Manṣūr

Sīdī al-Ḥassan b. Aḥmad	- suspicion of communication with enemy	8 m. 18 d.
-------------------------	---	------------

Prisoners not held in Ajdīr in December 1924, but in custody for more than 6 months in May 1924

Qal'aya

Sha'ib b. Muḥ	- arrested on coast at Sīdī Misa'ūd	6 m. 29 d.
Muḥ 'Abd al-Qādir	- arrested on coast at Sīdī Misa'ūd	6 m. 29 d.
Mimūn b. Muḥammad b. Ṭayyib	- arrested by maḥalla	7 m. 3 d.

Table IX: 9Numbers of individuals imprisoned for named crimes on26 December 1923, 17 February 1924, 2 May 1924and 5 May 1924

Crime	26 Dec. 1923	17 Feb. 1924	2 May 1924	5 May 1924
Military offences
1. Refused service under qā'id /absent from ḥarka	3	3	4	2
2. Captured in battle	1	5	6	4
3. Arrested by army	1	1	1	1
Civil and religious offences
4. Arrested by qā'ids etc.	3	3	-	-
5. ḥannāsh (.e., general bad conduct)	3	-	10	6
Criminal offences
6. Murder/suspicion of	5	10	16	17
7. Fighting/assault	8	5	-	-
Wartime offences
8. Suspicion of spying	11	14	23	20
9. Visiting Spanish zone	4	5	6	-
10. Living in Spanish zone/ former Spanish employee	5	9	10	10
11. Suspected sabotage	-	2	2	2
12. Hostage	-	2	2	2
13. Captured members of 'Amār b. Ḥamīdu's party	-	18	46	46
14. Unclear	30	11	4	3
15. Other	22	14	16	16
TOTAL	96	102	146	129

Source: MAEF, Maroc 519, pp. 138-139, 143-144, 146-147. The term ḥannāsh is derived from the term for a snake charmer and was used in the qānūns of the period before the Rif war to mean "evil doers", Hart, Emilio Blanco II, p. 289.

appointed muhtasibs, market inspectors, to carry out this function. This was another relatively new idea in the Rif and itself posed problems for the officials concerned, for they were unsure of the extent of their duties. A scribbled note, preserved in the archives of the French Foreign Ministry, gives some indication of this. It is neither dated nor does it contain any hint as to the person to whom it was sent, but the significance is clear enough:

"Sir, the muhtasib Sidi 'Amar al-Jalmūṣī asks for a clarification of his duties.

They are: does he have jurisdiction in the matter of the collection of long-standing debts that are contracted in [his] market, or not, after the complainant has left the collection to him?

What is [his] jurisdiction in the case of two antagonists who challenge each other over a contentious matter in the market, if one of them refuses to meet him and then the complainant comes back to me? Do I have a free hand or should I send my helpers behind his back and refer it to the council of the shar'? I have already referred the matter to the 'āmils and they refuse to take it under their jurisdiction. Also in the case of a man buying and selling animals and cattle who comes with the permission of his 'āmil to buy and sell, is he free to do as he wishes in that matter, because of the permission of 'āmil, or is he forbidden it all?"¹

Such questions imply a very detailed control of markets at least, and a strong centralisation of power. Such control is also to be seen in a later document, dating from June or July 1925 and issued in the Gaznayya tribe on the instructions of b. 'Abd al-Karīm's pasha, setting a fine of 6 pts for anyone stealing nuts or grain or fruit, or anyone who allowed his cattle to graze upon the leaves of trees belonging to others.² But whereas agreements on theft and illegal grazing existed before the Rif Republic, such institutions as muhtasibs were entirely new.

¹ Ibid., p. 183, Note from Sidi 'Amār al-Jalmūṣī, no date, no recipient named.

² Quoted in Hart, Aith Waryaghar, pp. 389-390.

The Changing Life-Style of the Rif

Bin 'Abd al-Karim's reforms went far beyond legal penalties for wrongdoing. He was attempting, after all, to build a new unified state in the Rif, and everything that emphasised differences amongst his subjects he tried to suppress. Some of these differences might, at first sight, seem relatively minor. For example, before the Rif Republic men from each tribe had worn distinctive scalplocks, thus setting them apart from neighbouring tribes.¹ Bin 'Abd al-Karim ordered that all men cut off their scalplocks, and although some re-grew them after the war, the practice has now died out completely.² In a further effort to abolish feuding, he ordered that all the watch-towers previously attached to Rifi houses, and useful for sniping at enemies, should be destroyed.³

Other legal reforms were purely social: bin 'Abd al-Karim abolished the smoking of hashish, forbade men to go barefoot,⁴ and limited the amount of money which was paid to the parents of a bride before a wedding to a maximum of 500 pesetas (it had previously reached 2,500 pesetas on occasion.)⁵

Conclusion

After the battle of Anwāl, bin 'Abd al-Karim

¹ Coon, Tribes of the Rif, pp. 127-128.

² Ibid., p. 128, and Hart, Aith Waryaghar, p. 390.

³ Ibid., p. 38.

⁴ Ibid., p. 390.

⁵ Coon, Tribes of the Rif, p. 133.

had called a meeting in his house where he had spoken of the need to fight the Spanish. Some found it difficult to believe that he had changed sides, others, despite the flight of the Spanish, were still pessimistic about the possibility of final victory, and asked "How can you fight a country with a flag and a government?"¹ Bin 'Abd al-Karīm's answer was to create his own government, with its own flag. The form of the flag, incidentally, is much disputed. However, the example preserved in the Army Museum in Madrid shows a red background in the centre of which is a white diamond with a green six-pointed star and crescent. Skīraj shows a slightly different arrangement (a white square and a battle flag with a smaller crescent and star and the words "Lā ~~ilāh~~^{allāh} ilā Allāh Muḥammad Rasūl Allāh" ("There is no god but God and Muḥammad is the messenger of God") in gold (see Photograph IX: 10).² About the existence of his government there can be no doubt, however.

The bay'a of February 1923 had laid the obligation of the Caliphate upon bin 'Abd al-Karīm--these obligations were religious--the imposition of the sharī'a, and political--the winning of the war against the Spanish. To fulfil them, bin 'Abd al-Karīm carried out a thorough reorganisation of the Rif. This reorganisation was vital if he was to win the war against the Spanish, and thus the introduction of the sharī'a helped in the military struggle by ending blood feuds, bringing about unity, and strengthening the power of the makhzan. At the same time the battle

¹ Personal information, Idrīs al-Khaṭṭābī, Sept. 1977.

² Skīraj, op. cit., p. 145.

Photograph IX: 10

The flags of the Rīfī state: top, the flag flown at the maḥakmas; bottom, the battle flag of the mujāhidīn.

Source: Drawing based on the flags drawn by Skīraj (op. cit., p. 145)

On following page: photograph of the only existing Rīfī flag.

Source: Photograph supplied by Museo del
Ejército, Madrid

against the Spanish had to be won if the sharī'a was to be totally effected. The one depended upon the other.

So bin 'Abd al-Karīm formed a makhzan. It was in the traditional pattern of a local qā'id building up a miniature state in the sense that it was largely--though by no means entirely--made up of members of his own family and tribe, but was modern in the sense that in one vital area it looked beyond its leader's immediate family, for the people most immediately concerned with the imposition of the sharī'a--Bū Laḥya, al-Shargī, and others--were not Waryaghliis at all.

It was also modern in another way--the great power of the centre. For a state like the Rif, with relatively few educated people, and during a war, the amount of bureaucracy is extraordinary. Careful records were kept of the payment of troops, of those incarcerated in the prisons, of the issue of arms. Efforts were made to change the physical aspects of the Rif--roads and telephone lines were built, bringing the periphery closer to the centre.

The foundation of this new state meant that bin 'Abd al-Karīm's own position went far beyond that of a military leader of an alliance of tribes against an outside invader, or that of a tribal leader who was trying to set up a new dynasty. The bay'a put him firmly in the rôle of a Caliph, as the spiritual and political leader of the faithful in the Rif. The obligations traditionally placed on a Moroccan Sultan included the defence of the religion and the state. These obligations were also placed on bin 'Abd al-Karīm. He also formed a government on the model of the traditional Moroccan makhzan, with its own army, its own flag, its own administration, and so on. At first sight, then, it looks as though this was an attempt to create a new Sultanate in the Rif.

However, bin 'Abd al-Karīm, both at the time and later, claimed that he did not wish to impinge on the authority of the Sultan of Morocco, that he was not a king, but the united voice of his people. To confuse matters further, the new state was known by two names: al-Dawla al-Jumhūriya al-Rīfiya (literally "The Rifian Republican State"), and al-Jabha al-Rīfiya ("The Rifian Front"). The first of these titles appeared on official notepaper,¹ and the second was its title in retrospect, as given by later informants.² These two expressions need some explanation.

The term jabha implies that the Rif was only one front in the campaign for the liberation of all Morocco, a factor that would become an issue of great importance in 1925. Jumhūriya, on the other hand, is a word coined from the Arabic word jumhūr (crowd, mass) in the late eighteenth century to describe a new concept of government, originating in Europe. Its import was not so much an emphasis on republicanism -- which is what the word now means in Arabic -- but a concern with the constitutional relationships between the monarch and the people. Of course, according to sunnī jurists, the sharī'a implied that theoretically the Islamic state should be headed by a non-hereditary elected sovereign, so some nineteenth and twentieth-century writers felt able to describe the doctrine of the Caliphate as "republican" as a result, in the sense of connoting popular and representative government rather than what is normally understood as "republican" in Europe. In fact, the term jumhūriya came into practical use only during the First World War, to describe the short-lived "Republic" of Azerbaijan in May 1918, and the equally transitory Republic of Tripolitania in November 1918.¹ The comparison with Tripolitania is close, at first sight, for in that part of Africa, theoretically under the control of the Italians, who had failed to impose any form of permanent order, an independent proto-state, based on Misurata, had been set up in 1918 under Turko-German influence to resist the Italians. It was styled the Jumhūriya al-Ṭrablūsīya and was ruled by a "Committee of Reform" headed by Ramaḍān al-Shtāiwi. This government was not, however, nearly so powerful as bin 'Abd al-Karīm's, and found it hard to maintain order, though it received considerable support from the European left.²

¹ Paper with this heading was found by Spanish troops at the end of May 1926 when they occupied bin 'Abd al-Karīm's last residence at the zawiya of Sīdī 'Abdullah bin Yūsif in the Banū al-Waryaghal, Sánchez-Pérez, op. cit., p. 126.

² Hart, Aith Waryaghar, p. 377.

It must be said that the term jumhūriya cannot in the case of the Rīf at least, be translated simply by the English word "republic". There are two very good reasons for avoiding this translation. In the first place it is misleading because although the word ripublik was certainly known in the Rīf and used in the colloquial dialect, it had a meaning quite different from the European word from which it was derived. As bin 'Abd al-Karīm explained to Vincent Sheean, for the Rīfīs the term ripublik meant "small local groups, even smaller than tribes . . . We have several 'republics' in every grouping of Riffi infantry."¹ In the second place, the term "republic" in European usage implies a state which is governed either by elected representatives or by a head of state who was not king. As we have seen, neither of these descriptions fits the Rif very well.

¹ Encyclopedia of Islam, new ed. Vol. II, pp. 594-595, article by B. Lewis "Djumhūriyya".

² E.E. Evans-Pritchard, The Sanusi of Cyrenaica (Oxford, 1973), p. 147.

Although bin 'Abd al-Karīm did consult his supporters over some matters, such consultation did not diminish his own personal power. Furthermore, by accepting the title of amīr al-mu'minīn, and the responsibilities of a "local caliphate" he was going far beyond the usually accepted authority of a secular "president".

To explain jumhūrīya, it is necessary first of all to look at its meaning in Arabic. Its origins in the word meaning "mass" or "crowd" are a clue. Bin 'Abd al-Karīm in accepting his bay'a, claimed to represent the collective voice of his people, and their desire to come together to defeat the Spanish, although as far as he was concerned, the collective voice's authority beyond that expressing desire was very limited. Thus jumhūrīya represented a statement, at least in theory, of the popular basis of the Rifi movement and expressed a wider and more permanent movement than a mere tribal alliance. Probably even more important, the choice of the word jumhūrīya was influenced by the fact that it had a certain contemporary currency in the Islamic world after the end of the First World War. It was, in fact, in vogue, and its use bore public witness to the modern aspect of the new Rifi government. Finally, the term was a statement that a new political entity had come into existence in the Rīf--and not in Morocco--thereby emphasising not only its modernity but also its independence. To sum up, the word jumhūriya, although it is very difficult to determine its exact meaning either to the citizens of the new state, or to its rulers, was an indication that the system of government, law and society in the Rīf had changed. Out of an alliance behind the figure of Muḥammad bin 'Abd al-Karīm, which had grown up among a few tribes before the war, a new state had emerged, dependent on bin 'Abd al-Karīm, and strictly under his control. a control which gave him almost absolute power over the administration which he and his supporters set up, over the legal system which had replaced the old system of fines, and over the army which owed its allegiance to bin 'Abd al- Karīm. It was to this power that Robert Montagne, in his remarks on the social and political transformation of the Rīf, pointed:

¹ Sheean, Adventures, p. 179. See also Hart in Colloque, pp. 33-45, who makes the same point.

"The authority of the new Sultan [sic] is harshly used . . . and it is held in the unlimited respect which force commands in this country. We are far now from the vague submission of old to the Sultan in Fez."¹

Of course, as Montagne himself pointed out in other works, a powerful figure had risen before among Berber tribes in Moroccan history, and started a new dynasty.² But this new state was not like that.

What distinguished this state from the Berber proto-states of the past was firstly the new modern organisation, the army and government, formed along European and Islamic reformist lines respectively, and secondly its effects on the ordinary citizen, which were quite unlike anything that had been seen before. In the space of three years every major part of Rifi life had been revolutionised. Feuding had effectively been abolished. Powerful shaykhs were held in check now, not by the strength or otherwise of their colleagues in the tribe, but by the centralised force of their new governor. A glance at the prison register is sufficient to show how many shaykhs did not realise this and were imprisoned, or worse, for their crimes.

¹ R. Montagne, "Quelques aspects de la transformation politique du Rif 1898-1925" (Military Intelligence report in SHAT, Maroc, Fez, 156, Renseignement sur les chefs indigènes, p. 14).

² Montagne, Berbers, passim.

Crime itself had been revolutionised. Now, an offence was no longer an offence against an individual or his family, or against the community in which a man might live, but against the wider community of the state. This change of emphasis also meant that the range of crimes was increased from concern with murder or theft to treachery against the new state, and because this was an attempt at an Islamic state, to offences against the sharī'a. For the first time, outside authority could, and did, intervene in what had hitherto been private or at most family or clan matters: the payment of debts, marital peace, were enforced not by a man's neighbours but by the state.

The social reforms of the new state went beyond simple criminal acts--they set new standards of behaviour, attendance at prayers, for example, even the wearing of shoes, were enjoined on the Rifis. The social differences which could so easily divide Rifi society--such as scalplocks--were removed.

In return for these reforms--or sacrifices--the Rifis received relative peace at home. It doubtless benefited them greatly in a material sense. In a political sense it was even more vital, for peace and order at home meant that the war against the Spanish and against 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu could more easily be pursued.

In short, as Montagne wrote in 1925:

"The political and military events in the Rif, which for the past five years have so often surprised Spain, France and all Europe, have caused in this small corner of the Sherifian Empire, a profound change in social and political attitudes, to the point at which the face of the country is no longer recognisable, and quite different from that in our own zone."¹

¹ Montagne, "Quelques aspects . . .", p. 1.

Chapter X

THE RĪFĪ STATE ON THE OFFENSIVE

FEBRUARY 1923 TO SEPTEMBER 1923

"In the present circumstances it [i.e., Spanish success in Morocco] is impossible. Swarming as it [the Tetuan area] does with her lowest-class Andalusians is enough to convince me of that. Two things stand out clearly. Firstly not ten generations will make the Spaniards acceptable to the Moors, and not in ten generations, such as it is at present, [will Spain] convey any civilisation to Morocco."

British Vice-Consul Were, in Tetuan, commenting on the future of the Spanish in Morocco, August 1923.¹

"It now appears that your friends are of no interest to you and Idrīs al-Rifī treats them like Jews."

Letter from shaykhs of the Banū Tūzīn to Spanish High Commissioner, March 1923.²

"What has happened that you betray the promise that you made me that we should work together? You knew of the struggle, the difficulties, the danger that I am in because I work with you, and yet you have forgotten me and compromised me among the tribes and given me no support . . . You have made me lose my goods, my men and my tribe."

Pro-Spanish qā'id complaining of lack of support, September 1923.³

¹ FO 371/9470/7048/44, Cochrington to Curzon, Tangier, 30 Aug. 1923, enclosing report by Were.

² SHM Melilla Leg. 22, Cartas Arabes 1, Beni Tuzin, All the shaykhs of the Banū Tūzīn without exception to the High Commissioner, 14 Rajab 1341/2 Mar. 1923.

³ SHM Ceuta Leg. 19, Cartas Arabes, 'Amar b. Aḥmad al-Marnīsi to Sīdī al-Wāfī al-Baqqālī, Spanish Pasha of Shāwin, 12 Ṣafar 1342/24 Sept. 1923.

The remarks quoted above all refer to rapidly declining political prestige of the Spanish authorities after the proclamation of bin 'Abd al-Karīm in January 1923. This declining prestige was mirrored by a rapid increase in the authority of bin 'Abd al-Karīm. There were a number of reasons for this, not all of them the result of Spanish insufficiencies, for the political and military power of the new Rīfī government increased in its own right. On the Spanish side there were a number of factors that decreased Spanish influence. In the first place, the Spanish were unable to help their supporters behind the Rīfī lines, in the second place, the contacts which the Spanish maintained with those supporters were maintained by their Pasha in Tafarsit--who became 'āmil of the Rīf, in accordance with the Spanish policy of organising their protectorate through Moroccan representatives. The new 'āmil was Idrīs al-Rīfī, who had already caused considerable disquiet in 1922. During 1923 his treatment of Spanish supporters resulted in yet more disillusion with Spanish policies. In addition, the military operations of the Spanish army were hampered by a weak government in Madrid, which was eventually replaced in a coup d'état in September 1923.

On the Rīfī side, bin 'Abd al-Karīm's mounting authority was the result of his ability to impose his will through the use of force. In the period following his proclamation, he succeeded in defeating 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu, extending his control into the Ghumāra and crushing an attempted revolt there. This control was not a mild affair, and involved the use of harsh tactics of repression, and the fact that he was able to overcome the resulting resistance showed the strength of the new state.

The Failure of the Spanish Civil Protectorate

In February 1923 a new civilian High Commissioner was appointed in Tetuan. This was Francisco Silvela, appointed to replace the Marqués de Villanueva, who had never taken office.¹ He took up his post on 14 February 1923 and was at once faced with difficulties with the army, for only a week later, on 21 February, the Comandante General in Melilla, General Losada, resigned after expressing dissatisfaction over the lack of an offensive policy in Morocco and over the attacks made on the army in the Spanish press. He was replaced by General Vives.² This distrust between the army and the government was to be a recurrent problem throughout 1923 and 1924.

There were even more immediate problems in the eastern zone, especially with Idrīs al-Rīfī, the man expected to become the one who carried out the policy of allowing the "natives" to govern themselves. He had never been popular as Pasha of Tafarsit,³ but things got steadily worse. By the last week in February 1924, he had succeeded in alienating most of the important leaders in the tribes bordering on the Spanish-occupied zone in the east. The Banū Tūzīn were particularly incensed. A meeting was held of the Tūzānī clans of Igharbiīn, Banū 'Aqqī, Banū Bil-'Aiz, and part of the Banū Tsafth, and the important zawiya of Bujdayn, which agreed not only to break off relations with Idrīs al-Rīfī but to join the guard round Tizzī 'Azzā, shaykhs from the Igharbiin wrote to the Spanish in March to say that five friends of the Pasha had been responsible for the destruction of bridges and the theft of telephone wire near Tafarsit.¹ There followed accusations that Idrīs treated people like Jews,² and even that he had deceived the Comandante General:

¹ See above, pp. 491-492.

² The Times, 15 Feb. 1923, p. 9, report dated Madrid, 14 Feb. 1923 and ibid., 22 Feb. 1923, p. 9, dated Madrid, 21 Feb. 1923.

³ See above, pp. 482-484.

"We must tell you about the men to whom you were introduced by Idrīs al-Rifī when you came to Tafarsit last Thursday and who were from the clan of Banū Bil-'Aiz. Idrīs al-Rifī told you 'These two are notables (a'yān) of the Banū Tūzīn.' It is not true that they are our notables. One of them is employed in the selling of eggs and chickens. The other sells lemons . . ."3

Another letter threatened to cut off relations with the Spanish unless Idrīs al-Rifī was removed.⁴

The Spanish were faced with a spate of anonymous letters of this sort, all threatening to break off relations. Anonymous letters can mean two things, of course, either that the allegations are untrue and malicious, or that they are true, and are not signed in order to protect the writer. However, the suspicions of Spanish Military Intelligence were aroused, and a close watch kept on the Pasha's home, but without coming to any very clear conclusions as to what he was doing.⁵

Nevertheless, on 9 May 1923, in pursuance of the policy of local self-government, Idrīs al-Rifī was installed

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 22, Cartas Arabes 1, Beni Tuzin, 'Allāl b. 'Allāl al-Maghrīnī and Muḥammad b. 'Amar to Colonel,
2 Sha'bān 1341/20 Mar. 1923.

² Ibid., Shaykhs of the Banū Tūzīn to High Commissioner, 14 Rajab 1341/2 Mar. 1923.

³ Ibid., The a'yān of the Banū Tūzīn to Comandante General, received 22 Mar. 1923.

⁴ Ibid., The a'yān of the Banū Tūzīn al-Jabal to Colonel,
2 Sha'bān 1341/20 Mar. 1923.

⁵ SHM Melilla Leg. 23, Información Abril, nota, 4a Mía (Vigilancia), 6 Apr. 1923.

as 'āmil of the Rif, thus re-establishing "the ancient Rif province".¹ As Walter Harris pointed out, however, "The Pasha's chief work for some time will be to endeavour to take possession of his province."² British Vice-Consul Were, in a typically pessimistic despatch, made the same point:

"No useful result is to be expected from this appointment. Dris er Riffi [sic], despite his name, is not a Riffian, and he enjoys no personal prestige in the Riff. It is, however, interesting as being a step in the direction of a semi-independent province approximating to the status demanded for it by Abd el-Krim."³

In fact, of course, the new status of the Rif province was in no way comparable with the independence that bin 'Abd al-Karīm sought, but it is an interesting development of the argument that the demand for independence should be met with an offer of internal autonomy, thereby saving Spanish troops and money.

A similar policy was being adopted in the western zone. The pact concluded with al-Raisūlī in September 1922 and confirmed by al-Raisūlī's semi-submission to the khalīfa in December⁴ still held, and the Jibāla was relatively peaceful. In May 1923, al-Raisūlī had returned to his former palace at Asīla,⁵ although he did not remain there long. Yet, as Walter Harris, who approved in principle of the introduction of a civil administration, pointed out, it would have been more successful had the adoption of that policy not been the result of the Anwāl disaster, and been taken from

¹ The Times, 12 May 1923, p. 11. dated Tangier, 11 May 1923.

² Ibid.

³ FO 371/9469/W4237/44/28, Were to Codrington, Tetuan, 19 May 1923.

⁴ See above, pp. 456-457.

⁵ The Times, 4 June 1923, p. 11, dated Madrid, 3 June 1923.

a position of strength.¹

However, no one was really satisfied by the political changes. Al-Raisūlī, angered by attacks on him in the Spanish press, threatened to "retire" from politics.² Spanish press attacks--all part of a general campaign by the opposition press in Spain to discredit their government's policy in morocco--also upset Idrīs al-Rifī and he apparently expressed a wish to resign. He was only prevented by "the earnest entreaties of the High Commissioner."³ His position was made worse when he lost a close friend of Idrīs b. Sa'id, the man who had for so long carried on negotiations for the release of the prisoners, and thereby threatened to subvert the Rifī state.⁴ Idrīs b. Sa'id, who had also been attacked in the Spanish press, was shot while he, Idrīs al-Rifī, and a group of Spanish officers were watching the construction of a blockhouse near Tafarsit.⁵ A number of rumours spread as to the reason for this murder. British Vice-Consul Were reported that it was done on the orders of Castro Girona because of the links between Idrīs b. Sa'id and Echevarieta, the Basque millionaire who had negotiated the release of the prisoners.⁶ Unlikely as this may sound, a similar story, that the murder was carried out as the result of the feud between the army and the government over the policy of the civil protectorate, was reported to me by the son of bin 'Abd

¹ Ibid., 11 Apr. 1923, p. 12, dated Tangier.

² Ibid., 19 June 1923, p. 14, dated Tangier, 18 June 1923.

³ FO 371/9496/W5598/44/28, Were to Codrington, Tetuan, 22 June 1923.

⁴ See above, pp. 472, 493.

⁵ The Times, 23 June 1923, p. 14, dated Madrid, 21 June 1923.

⁶ FO 371/9496/W5598/44/28, Were to Codrington, Tetuan, 22 June 1923.

al-Karīm in 1977.¹ Bin 'Abd al-Karīm himself was given another story by the man who allegedly committed the murder, one Wuld al-Ḥassan of Tafarsit, and bin 'Abd al-Karīm had him arrested and imprisoned. In his defence Wuld al-Ḥassan claimed that he shot Idrīs bin Sa'id because "he saw that the Makhzan [i.e., Spain] was about to occupy a position on his land, and also he did not know that the shots would hurt Drīs ben Said [sic]."²

Idrīs al-Rifī may not have been content, but the Spanish army was not happy either. At the beginning of July the Comandante General of Melilla was replaced yet again, this time by General Severiano Martínez Anido,³ who had made his reputation during his office as Captain-General, and later as Civil Governor, in Barcelona, where he earned a reputation for brutality in his dealings with the syndicalist movement.⁴

Such a man was unlikely to appreciate the government's problems of financing the war in Morocco--which was now costing 750,000,000 pesetas a year (the equivalent

¹ Personal information, Idrīs al-Khaṭṭābī, Sept. 1977.

² SHM Melilla Leg. 25, Información Julio, nota, 3 July 1923, interestingly a certain "bin al-Ḥassan" was mentioned by Ḥaddu b. Ḥammu in a report from Tafarsit in Oct. 1921 as being noticeably anti-Rifī, MAEF, Maroc 517, p. 154, Ḥaddu b. Ḥammu al-Buqquyī to Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Karīm, 25 Ṣafar 1340/28 Oct. 1921.

³ The Times, 7 June 1923, dated Madrid, 6 June 1923.

⁴ His methods in Barcelona, according to Brennan, "were neither legal ones; nor even those sanctioned by military law such as arbitrary imprisonment and trial by court martial." His Chief of Police armed a gang of gunmen "and gave them a list of the Syndicalist leaders whom they were to shoot on sight." Brennan quotes Miguel de Unamuno, the Spanish novelist and philosopher, as saying of him, "The man is a pure brute--he can't even talk, he can only roar and bray, though his roars and brays always mean something." Gerald Brennan, The Spanish Labyrinth, an Account of the Social and Political Background of the Civil War (Cambridge, 1969), p. 73.

of £25,000,000 at that period) and he pressed for more troops in order to undertake a landing at Alhucemas. The military estimated that this would involve at least 6,000 casualties, so not surprisingly the government was most unwilling to allow it. On 14 August, his plan for the landing having been rejected, Martínez Anido resigned and yet another Comandante General for Melilla was appointed, General Enrique Marzo.¹

Meanwhile, the Madrid government sent a commission of the General Staff headed by General Weyler to Morocco on a fact-finding expedition. On its return, it reported that the eastern line should be defended, that an all-volunteer army should be set up in Morocco, that political action among the unsubmitted tribes should be increased, and that further action should be taken against the Banū Waryaghal.²

This report, and the subsequent debate on the proposed landings at Alhucemas, brought about yet another government crisis. On 23 August 1923, troops embarking for Morocco at Málaga mutinied and shot their sergeant. A corporal who had led this mutiny was sentenced to death but then reprieved by the government, which also forbade any further troop movements to Morocco.³ The army was not pleased.

Even by its own lights the civil Protectorate policy was a failure. Under the previous army control the Protectorate authorities had spent 815,000 pesetas in three months on education, and the development of trade and commerce. Under the new policy, over the same length of time, only 383,000 pesetas was expended on these things.¹ As The Times pointed out, "This can hardly be considered anything but a very poor demonstration of colonizing activity."²

¹ The Times, 4 Aug. 1923, p. 7, dated Madrid, 2 Aug. 1923, and 8 Aug. 1923, p. 10, dated Madrid, 7 Aug. 1923, and 15 Aug. 1923, p. 9, dated Madrid, 14 Aug. 1923, and 23 Aug. 1923, p. 10, dated Madrid, 22 Aug. 1923.

² Fleming, op. cit., pp. 84-85.

³ Payne, Politics and the Military, p. 196.

The full details of Weyler's plans were released on 3 September. Three ministers resigned when the Foreign Minister, Alba, agreed to change the policy and accept the idea, expressed in the report, of carrying out landings at Alhucemas. The cabinet resigned, but re-formed, and the government limped along for a little while longer.³

However, the army had been plotting a coup for some time. The man chosen to lead it was Miguel Primo de Rivera. Primo de Rivera had in the past expressed firm views on the need to withdraw from Morocco to defensive positions on the coast⁴ so on the face of it he would appear to have been an unlikely candidate for the task of leading the Spanish army to greater glory in Morocco. However, he was one of the few high-ranking generals who had both taken no part in the arguments over the military defence Juntas,⁵ and who was untouched by the Anwāl scandal. Furthermore, he had made serious efforts during the preceding months to persuade his co-conspirators that he had moderated his views on Morocco, and no longer felt the need for a total withdrawal.⁶

¹ The Times, 28 Aug. 1923, p. 7, dated Madrid, 24 Aug. 1923.

² Ibid.

³ Payne, Politics and the Military, pp. 196-197.

⁴ See above, p. 393.

⁵ See above, pp. 476-477, for an explanation of the Juntas de Defensa.

⁶ Payne, Politics and the Military, pp. 194-195.

On 13 September 1923, Primo de Rivera proclaimed martial law in Barcelona, where he was Captain-General, and announced a Military Directory. For a day or so success was uncertain, but on 15 September, with the King's tacit support, Primo arrived in Madrid and formed a government.¹

The Moroccan problem was by no means the only factor which led to the coup--terrorism, corruption, and national security played their part as well. But many of the Moroccan commanders distrusted Primo's intentions in Morocco and he came into conflict with them very soon.

Meanwhile, in Morocco, there were other changes. Idrīs al-Rifī was promoted to a position of authority in Tetuan so that he could gradually be eased out of direct contact with the local people. In July 1923, two a'yān of the Banū Tūzīn wrote to the Spanish to express their satisfaction, and promised they would work with the Spanish more closely in the future.² In September, another letter arrived from a shaykh of 'Azrū, in the Gaznaya, saying that he would resume relations with the Spanish, which he had broken off because of Idrīs al-Rifī.³

The Battle against 'Amr b. Ḥamīdu

At the very moment when bin 'Abd al-Karīm was being proclaimed, 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu, the old enemy of the Rifī leader in the Sinhāja, was trying to gather forces to attack him again.

¹ Ibid., pp. 198-201.

² SHM Melilla Leg. 22, Cartas Arabes, I, Beni Tuzin, Qā'id 'Abd al-Salām b. Mizzyāz al-Miḍārī and al-'Abbās al-Bujdaynī to Colonel, 8 Dhu al-Ḥijja 1341/22 July 1923. Note that once again a member of the Bujdayn family was helping the Spanish.

³ SHM Melilla Leg. 22, Cartas Arabes I, Igzinnayen, Aḥmad b. 'Amar to Colonel, received 5 Sept. 1923.

On 12 January, five days before the first proclamation, 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu was reported to have taken a column of 1,800 men from several tribes against the Rifī dominated Banū 'Amārt in support of the Wargha tribes, who had started fighting the Banū 'Amārt a few days before. Once again, bin Ḥamīdu's forces attacked the houses of Muḥammad b. al-Ṭayyib, bin 'Abd al-Karīm's qā'id in the Banū 'Amārt, who was still held by 'Abd al-Mālik as a prisoner.¹ The houses were burned and the inhabitants fled to safety in the Banū Waryaghāl. Bin 'Abd al-Karīm's supporters in the Banū Waryaghāl then attacked those of 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu in the Banū Ḥadhīfa clan of that tribe. Seven of bin 'Abd al-Karīm's men were killed in this attack.²

'Amar b. Ḥamīdu had been joined by al-Ḥājǰ Bil-Qīsh of the Gaznaya. They both appealed to the Spanish for money at the beginning of February and tried to prevent bin 'Abd al-Karīm's declaration as Sultan in the Tuesday market at Azilāf.³

For the moment, bin 'Abd al-Karīm was not very worried by the two southern leaders for he was much more concerned about the Spanish and he ordered his front line to be reinforced: in mid-February, over 1,000 men were sent to the eastern lines.⁴ The greater importance which bin 'Abd al-Karīm gave to the Spanish was the result of divisions.

¹ See above, p. 481.

² SHM Melilla Leg. 23, Información Enero, Ḥamid b. 'Abd al-Salām b. Ḥamid, 12 Jan. 1923.

³ SHM Melilla Leg. 23, Información Febrero, T.O.C., Comandante Intervención to Comandante General and Coronel de Policía (Tafarsit), 7 Feb. 1923, and Información del día, 8 Feb. 1923.

⁴ Ibid., Sī Muḥammad al-Faḥsī and Muḥammad Agharbī, 15 Feb. 1923.

among his opponents in the Sinhāja and Marīsa. On 8 March, several Marnīsīs wrote to the Spanish to explain that they had fallen out with 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu and had transferred their allegiance to 'Abd al-Mālik.¹

Apparently the argument was over the release of prisoners held by 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu. 200 men from the Banū 'Amārt had appealed to Bil-Qīsh in mid-February to ask 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu to release prisoners from their tribe and others from the Banū Waryaghāl. Bin Ḥamīdu replied that before he did so the petitioners would have to fight bin 'Abd al-Karīm for two months, and that the Waryaghli prisoners would have to pay a 250,000 pesetas fine each. (The amount seems excessive to say the least.) Matters became worse when 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu was held responsible for a murder committed in the Marnīsa, but refused to pay the fine of 20,000 pesetas that was demanded. This was yet another demonstration of the fact that unity, be it against the Spanish or against bin 'Abd al-Karīm could not last long if it depended solely on the fragile system of ḥaqq-fines. The other shaykhs of the Marnīsa wrote to the other Sinhāja tribes to ask that their shaykhs should come to enforce the fine. These shaykhs apparently put pressure on 'Abd al-Mālik, who ensured that the prisoners were released--including, at last, Muḥammad b. al-Ṭayyib, bin 'Abd al-Karīm's former qā'id in the Banū 'Amārt.² Bin 'Abd al-Karīm's supporters

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 22, Cartas Arābes 2, Marnīsa y Wargha, 'Abd al-Salām b. al-Ḥājǰ Muḥammad al-Yidrī, Mīsa'ūd b. al-Jalālī, al-Ḥājǰ Muḥammad Butuba [sic], 'Alī b. [illegible], and Muḥammad b. al-Ḥājǰ Muḥammad al-Bashīrī to 'Abd al-Salām al-Fannāssī, 20 Rajab 1341/8 Mar. 1923.

² Ibid. and SHM Melilla Leg. 21, Información, Amar Hamido, Información 4a Mía, 15 Feb. 1923, and Información 4a Mía, 8 Mar. 1923.

took the opportunity to burn down 'Amar bin Ḥamīdu's house. So the Marnīsa and five other Sinhājan tribes--the Banū Wanjil, Awlād Bū Slāma, Fannāssa, Banū Walīd and Matīwa al-Jabal--agreed to work with 'Abd al-Mālik and the Spanish rather than with 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu.¹

Not surprisingly, bin 'Abd al-Karīm tried to use this split in the ranks of his opponents to divide them even further. With the help of Muḥammad bin 'Amar Akhiṭṭu, he managed to get some considerable support among the Gaznaya, in an attempt to cut off Bil-Qīsh from 'Amar bin Ḥamīdu.² However, this was unsuccessful and Bil-Qīsh collected a very large number of men and moved into the Banū Waryaghāl lands.³ At the same time, Rīfī forces obliged 'Abd al-Mālik to leave his base at Sī 'Alī b. Daūd. But he took refuge with 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu,⁴ a result which was the opposite of the one which had been intended.

Bin 'Abd al-Karīm responded to the renewal of the alliance by trying to buy support. 50,000 pesetas were sent to the Banū Tūzīn at the beginning of April and later in April, 150,000 pesetas were sent to help form a ḥarka in the Matīwa al-Jabal.⁵ This tactic was as ineffective for him as it had been for the Spanish before the war, for the

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 22, Cartas Arabes 2, Marnisa y Wargha, 'Abd al-Salām b. al-Ḥājj Muḥammad etc. to 'Abd al-Salām al-Fannāssi, 20 Rajab 1341/8 Mar. 1923; and SHM Melilla Leg. 22, Información, Amar Hamido, Información 4a Mía, 8 Mar. 1923.

² SHM Melilla Leg. 23, Información Marzo, Sī Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Qādir al-Faḥsī and Muḥammad b. al-Ḥājj Aghārbī, 11 Mar. 1923.

³ Ibid., Sī Muḥammad b. al-Ḥājj Ḥammu ('Azīb Miḍār), 13 Mar. 1923.

⁴ SHM Melilla Leg. 21, Información, Amar Hamido, 27 Mar. 1923.

⁵ Ibid., nota, 17 Apr., 1923, and SHM Melilla Leg. 23, Información Abril, T.O.C., Oficial encargado de Intervención to Cor. de Policía, 12 Apr. 1923.

response of the Banū Tūzīn was to ask for yet more money. This was all part of a Spanish plan that they should ask bin 'Abd al-Karīm for money so that "if he refuses, it will be each for himself in his own land, and after that [the rift] will become deeper and things more confused."¹

However, by the beginning of May, bin 'Abd al-Karīm's forces had grown stronger and things began to look difficult for his opponents. On 7 May the brother of 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu took two bulls to sacrifice to bin 'Abd al-Karīm as a gesture of peace. Bin 'Abd al-Karīm fixed the peace conditions at a fine of 50,000 pts and instructed 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu to stay in the Banū Waryaghāl under his command.²

It was also not long before Bil-Qīsh was also brought under control and by 22 May he had been forced to join the harka at Azilāf in preparation for an attack on 'Azīb Miḍār.³ 'Abd al-Mālik fled to the Spanish zone where at the beginning of July he was put in charge of a newly created group of Moroccan irregulars, named the "Harca [sic] de Abd el-Malek" in his honour. It was a rapidly assembled collection of local recruits, men from the Gharb, and former members of the Spanish native police, some 1,400 strong, but with no more than a minimum of instruction⁴--an undistinguished end to 'Abd al-Mālik's varied career.

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 22, Cartas Arabes 1, Bani Tuzin, Shaykh Ḥammu Wuld 'Amar al-Miḍārī to Colonel, 29 Sha'bān 1341/16 Apr. 1923.

² SHM Melilla Leg. 23, Información Mayo, T.O.C. Alférez Martínez to Cor. de Policía, Tafarsit, 7 May 1923.

³ Ibid., TOC. Comandante Interventor to Cor. de Policía, Tafarsit, 22 May 1923 and T.O.C. Comandante Interventor to Cor. de Policía, 22 May 1923.

⁴ Historial de la Harka Melilla, Campañas años 1924-1926, Melilla, Tipografía La Hispana, n.d. (but pre-1930), pp. 15-17.

For the present, then, Bil-Qīsh and 'Amar b. Ḥamīdū were subdued and, indeed, had been forced to support bin 'Abd al-Karīm; 'Abd al-Mālik was otherwise engaged. The Rifis could once again turn their attention to the Spanish and both defend their eastern lines and extend their power into the west and the Ghumāra.

The Campaign in the West

In 1922, a Rifī force under Sī Maḥammad had attempted to enforce some control over the Ghumāra. It had failed, and the Spanish, through the medium of al-Raisūlī, had succeeded in keeping the area relatively quiet.¹

At the beginning of January 1923, while preparations were being made in the Rif to proclaim b. 'Abd al-Karīm, the Rifis tried again to take the Jibāla and Ghumāra. On 2 January, a small ḥarka, mainly formed from the Banū Silmān and Banū Khālid, but including about 15 Rifis, was reported in Tandaman.² This was the precursor of a larger invasion. On 15 January, 300 Rifis were reported in the Banū Khālid led by Sī Tuḥāmī al-Wazzānī,³ a sharīf from the Banū Ḥassan whose subsequent changes of alliance were to prove a source of some difficulty to the Rifis. This force temporarily dominated the Banū Khālid, for on 8 January it had attacked the major pro-Spanish leader there, Sīdī Ḥamīdu b. 'Abd al-Wārith,⁴ who also caused the

¹ See above, p. 456.

² SHM Ceuta Leg. 19, Información 6a Mía--Enero de 1923, nota, 2 Jan. 1923.

³ SHM Ceuta Leg. 19, Información 5a Mía--Enero de 1923, nota, 15 Jan. 1923.

⁴ SHM Ceuta Leg. 19, Intervención Militar de Ajmās, Resumé of year 1923 (no date).

Rifis some difficulty later. The other tribes were less enthusiastic about the Rifis--the Akhmās, for instance, by far the most powerful tribe in the Jibāla, were still disposed toward al-Raisūlī.¹ The local qā'ids loyal to the Spanish tried to stop the ḥarka before things went too far. The Banū Silmān, Banū Manṣūr, and Banū Ziyyāt each sent 50 men to fight the Rifis. Meanwhile, bin 'Abd al-Wārith regrouped on the borders of the Banū Khālid and Akhmās, at Izuqān.²

Izuqān was burned on 18 January, and when b. 'Abd al-Wārith retired to Wadyān the next day, they attacked him there as well. At this point, one of the clans of the Banū Silmān changed sides, and attacked b. 'Abd al-Wārith from the rear. A pro-Spanish ḥarka sent from the Spanish position at Amṭār in the Banū Garīr was surrounded by anti-Spanish forces, several were killed, and the khalīfa of the Banū Sijjil, one of the ḥarka leaders, bought his own life for 15,000 pesetas. If he had not, he would have been shot, as some of the other prisoners were. The anti-Spanish ḥarka grew, in the expectation of booty, and the Banū Khālid clans of the Banū Zarwīl and Banū Anbāth sacrificed to al-Tuhāmī for peace.³

At some point during this fighting, bin 'Abd al-Karīm's most important supporter in the west, Sī Muḥammad b. Ṣadīq al-Akhamlīsh of Targīst, joined the anti-Spanish forces. The Akhamlīshīn, an important family of marabūṭs from Zargāt, whose influence prevailed over much of the Sinhāja, had already played a rôle of some importance in the Rif war,

¹ Ibid.

² SHM Ceuta Leg.19, Informadores, nota, 18 Jan. 1923.

³ Ibid., nota, 25 Jan. 1923.

in support of bin 'Abd al-Karīm. Sī Muḥammad's son Aḥmad had been murdered by 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu after a battle with the French at 'Ain Midyūna in 1919; his other sons and his grandson became commanders on various fronts against the French and Spanish during the war.¹ His nephews, the sons of his brother Sī 'Alī, were less reliable in the Rīfī cause, as will be seen. Now, Sī Muḥammad went to Banū Darqūl in the Akhmās with the intention of trying to secure for the Rīfīs a free run in Shāwin. He left behind him a ḥarka of 2,000 men in the Banū Khālīd, who were ready to attack the Akhmās if they did not cooperate.²

Meanwhile, in the wake of al-Akhamlīshī, Rīfī tax-collectors moved into the area, backed by armed force, making all protests useless.³ In February, a Rīfī force was reported to be in the Banū Sijjil with the intention of making a base at J. Qal'a overlooking Shāwin and moving on into the Banū Ḥassan.⁴ But such objectives were still beyond the limited forces at the disposal of the Rīfīs. The real effort came in March 1923. On 2 March, news came from the Banū Waryaghāl that 500 Rīfīs were on the way to Amṭār in the Banū Garīr.⁵

Likewise, in the Banū Mastāra, in the unoccupied part of the French zone, Mūlāy Aḥmad al-Baqar, al-Raisūlī's

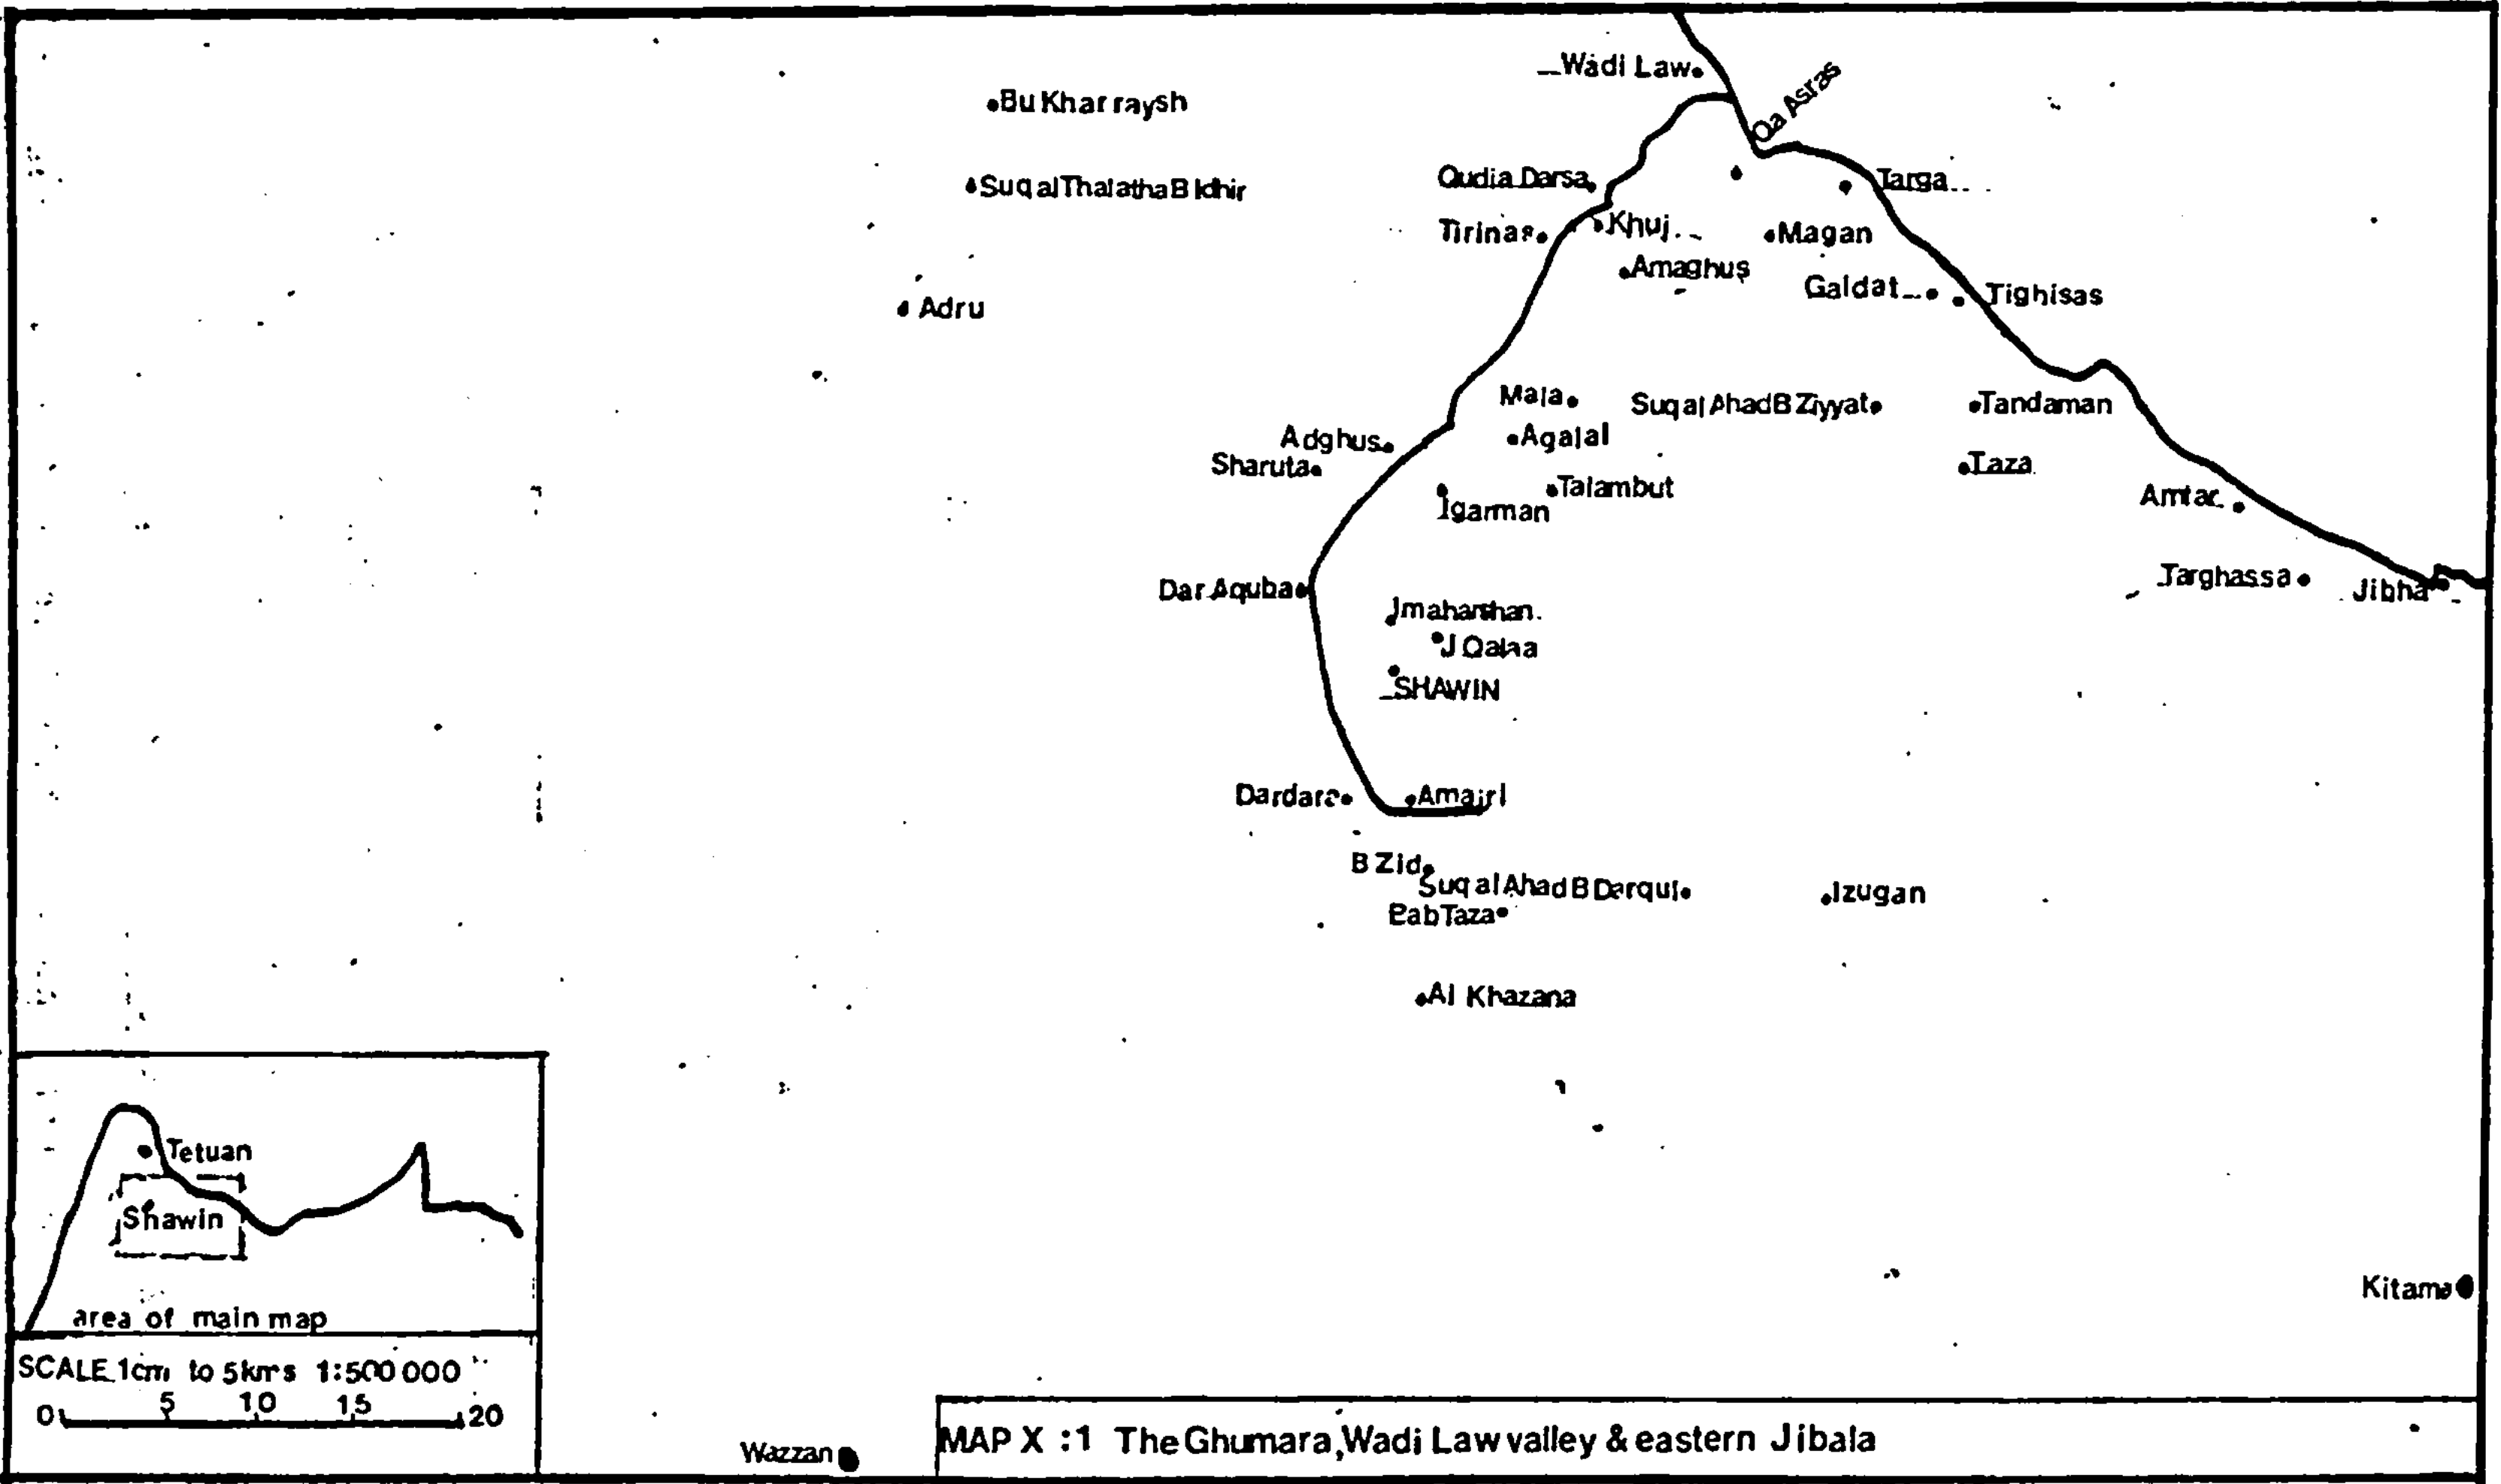

¹ Sī Muḥammad b. Ṣadiq had a history of opposition to the French and Spanish, see above, p. 363; "Maghzen Riffain", p. 14.

² SHM Ceuta Leg. 19, Información 7a Mía--Enero de 1923, nota, 22 Jan. 1923.

³ SHM Ceuta Leg. 19, Información 6a Mía, nota, 28 Jan. 1923.

⁴ SHM Ceuta Leg. 19, Intervención Militar de Ajmās, Resumé of year 1923.

⁵ SHM Ceuta Leg. 19, Mía no. 3--Marzo de 1923, nota, 2 Mar. 1923.

MAP X :1 The Ghumara, Wadi Law valley & eastern Jibala

Wazzan ●

old enemy,¹ was forming a ḥarka with which to oppose the sharīf in the Ghazāwa--in this he was cooperating with the Rifīs.² Evidently Rifī strength was growing, for the qā'id of Qal'a in the Banū Sijjil said that unless he received protection from the Spanish he would be forced to join the Rifīs,³ and leave the way to Shāwin open. The Ghumārīs agreed to give 1,500 pesetas from each tribe towards the maintenance of the Rifī ḥarka, and on 12 March they attacked Talambūt, the Spanish position protecting the road from Shāwin to Wādī Lāw.⁴ On 29 March, another 500 Rifīs under Qā'id Kuyās of the Zargat tribe arrived in the Banū Silmān, and were joined by 60 men from the Akhmās under 'Amar Zarḥūnī of the clan of Saba'a Qabail, "influenced by the events that are unfolding in the Ghumāra," as the Spanish report put it.⁵ Among the other leaders of this group which was equipped with 2 machine guns and 4 cannons--was Sī 'Abd al-Karīm b. 'Alī al-Ḥattāsh of the Banū Waryaghāl, who became one of the more important figures in the crushing of the Ghumāra revolt in 1924.⁶

The overwhelming impression of this period is one of confusion and lack of coordination. Most of it was taken up with guerilla-type attacks on villages supporting the Spanish--such as Amaghūs near Wādī Lāw on 23 April.⁷ Not

¹ See above, pp. 363-364.

² SHM Ceuta Leg. 19, Mía no. 5--Marzo de 1923, nota, 4 Mar. 1923.

³ SHM Ceuta Leg. 19, Mía no. 7--Marzo de 1923, nota, 6 Mar. 1923.

⁴ Ibid., nota, 9 Mar. 1923 and nota, 12 Mar. 1923.

⁵ Ibid., nota, 29 Mar. 1923.

⁶ SHM Ceuta Leg. 19, Mía no. 6--Marzo de 1923, nota, 13 Mar. 1923.

⁷ SHM Ceuta Leg. 19, Mía no. 3--Información abril, nota, 23 Apr. 1923.

surprisingly such attacks weakened the prestige of the Spanish, for people felt that they were being abandoned to the Rīfīs. Some of the Banū Sijjil expressed this feeling at the end of April, as did the Banū Sa'īd at the beginning of May.¹

On 20 May, a meeting was held at the Rīfī base camp at Tandaman to discuss the effort to invade the Banū Sijjil and then to turn on the Spanish positions, starting with Amṭār. Sī Tuhāmī al-Wazzānī was appointed top qā'id in the Ghumāra and the plans were agreed.²

Rīfī strength was growing rapidly now: they had been joined by the Banū Silmān, Banū Ziyyāt, Banū Bū Zrā and Banū Manṣūr.³ They had forces in the Banū Manṣūr,⁴ and the Banū Sa'īd felt so threatened that they had asked the Spanish for arms with which to defend themselves.⁵

The Rīfīs had also made political advances. The qādī of the Banū Sijjil, Sī Muḥammad b. Aḥmad b. al-'Arbī Ḥanīs was arrested by the Spanish in Wādī Lāw because of the threat he posed. He had helped the ḥarka in the attack on Talambūṭ, and had then sent a nephew, Sī al-'Arbī, to the Rīf to see bin 'Abd al-Karīm, and he returned with bin 'Abd al-Karīm's nomination as qā'id of the Banū Sijjil. Sī Muḥammad had then wrecked Spanish political action in the ¹ Ibid., nota, 30 Apr. 1923, and SHM Ceuta Leg. 20, 6a Mía --Información Mayo, nota, 1 May 1923.

² SHM Ceuta Leg. 20, Información P.I., T.O.C. Capt. Interv. Gomara to Cor. delegade de interv. mil., Wad Law, 20 May 1923, Urgente, and T.O.C. capt. Interv. Gomara to Cor. delegado Intervención Mil., Wad Law, 21 May 1923.

³ Ibid., T.O.C. Teniente de Interv. to Cor. Tropas de Policía, Tassa, 24 May 1923, Urgentissimo.

⁴ Ibid., T.O.C. Tte. Comandante 7a Mía to Cor. de Policía, Shawin, 25 May 1923, Urgente.

⁵ Ibid., T.O.C. Capt. Interv. Gomara to Cor. delegado de Interv. Mil., W. Law, 22 May 1923.

Banū Lait tribe by persuading the principal Spanish contact in that tribe, the Faqīh Sī al-Ḥājj Muḥammad "Budagia" [sic] not to work with the Spanish. The Spanish, fearing that he would raise the whole of the Banū Sijjil against them, cutting the Wādi Lāw to Shāwin road, arrested him and made arrangements for him to be transferred to the Hacho Prison in Ceuta.¹ In addition, some of the Akhmās went over to the Rīfī cause at the end of May, for al-Raisūlī's authority there was declining and the people round Shāwin threatened to kill anyone entering or leaving the city.²

By the beginning of June, there was a ḥarka of about 400 at Tandaman, mainly made up of men from the western Ghumāra; the Banū Silmān, Banū Khālid and Banū Manṣūr had also sent contingents--along with a small one from the Rīf--to attack Talambūṭ; and Mūlāy Aḥmad al-Baqarī and the son of Tuhāmī al-Wazzānī had joined together for a planned attack on Shāwin.³ It is quite clear from this that the main force of the operations against the Spanish in the Ghumāra came from the Ghumārīs themselves. They were certainly supplied and encouraged--and taxed--by the Rīfīs, but it was local people who supplied the main force, and much of the leadership--Wuld Sī Tuhāmī came from the Banū Ḥassan and Mūlāy Aḥmad from the Banū 'Arūs.

However, a firmer control by the Rīfīs was about to begin. On 25 June 1923, Sī Maḥammad returned to Ajdīr from Paris, where he had been for some months trying to negotiate with the French.¹ He was soon on his way to the Ghumāra to take command in the west.

¹ SHM Ceuta Leg. 20, Goumara, Mayo-Junio, 1923, Capt. Interv. to Cor. Amtar, 27 May 1923, and T.O.C. Oficial Cmdte. 6a Mía to Cor. Jefe T.P., Wad Lau, 26 May 1923.

² SHM Ceuta Leg. 20, Informacion 7a Mía--Mayo de 1923, nota, 28 May 1923, and nota, 29 May 1923.

³ SHM Ceuta Leg. 20, Información P.I., Junio 1923, T.O.C. Capt. Interv. Gomara to Cor. de P.I. Amtar, 2 June 1923, Urgente, and T.O.C. Tte. Cor. delegado to Cor. de P.I. Larache, 3 June 1923, Urgente, and T.O.C. Capt. Interv. Goumara to Col. delegado, Amtar, 5 June 1923.

Sī Maḥammad in the Ghumāra

A month after his return to Ajdīr, it was announced that Sī Maḥammad would go to the Ghumāra to take charge.² The reason was a revolt among the Ghumārīs. It was only a minor affair, nothing like on the scale of the one in the same area in 1924, but it could have been dangerous. Once again the quarrel was over taxation.³ On 5 July, representatives of the Ghumāra tribes loyal to the Rīfīs went to the Sunday market of Banū Darqūl in the Akhmās, and there made the sacrifice of a bull, in the hopes of receiving help from that quarter. The Akhmās refused.⁴ A week later, Mūlāy Aḥmad al-Baqar and Wuld Sī Tuhāmī al-Wazzānī went to the same market with the same intention.⁵ They seem to have been equally unsuccessful.

These failures must have comforted those Ghumārīs who were opposed to the Rīfīs. Certainly the Akhmās, while opposed to the Spanish were not keen to provide physical help to the Rīfīs. Bin 'Abd al-Karīm, clearly worried by these developments, moved to the maḥakma of Banū Bū Frāḥ, the command centre for the Ghumāra front. He first of all

¹ Skīraj, op. cit., p. 101.

² SHM Ceuta Leg. 20, Información Oficina Central, Julio de 1923, nota, 28 July 1923.

³ Skīraj, op. cit., p. 102.

⁴ SHM Ceuta Leg. 20, Información Oficina Central, Julio 1923, nota, 6 July, and nota, 8 July, 1923

⁵ Ibid., nota, 12 July 1923.

tried to calm the situation by lessening the tax burden and then by preparing a force of 1,000 men under 'Abd al-Karīm al-Ḥattāsh, with its qā'ids 100 drawn exclusively from the Banū Waryaghāl and the Buḡḡuya.¹ On 19 July, the Rifis appointed a new qā'id in the Banū Maṣūr,² and when rumours spread that the qā'id of the Banū Silmān was about to go over to the Spanish he was arrested by the Rifis and taken to Ajdīr, where more rumours stated he was executed.³

As the Rifī forces under al-Ḥattāsh moved into the Ghumāra, they encountered considerable resistance. At the beginning of August, their only sure support was in the Banū Silmān, around Tandaman in the Banū Bū Zrā, and in part of the Banū Ziyāt. However, the Rifis quickly stopped the revolt. As they regained control, they appointed new qā'ids in each tribe, not necessarily from the tribe itself. For instance, on 6 August Aḥmad al-Baḡar from the Banū 'Arūs was appointed over the Banū Ziyāt.⁴ Several Ghumārī notables were arrested and taken to prison in Ajdīr, and fines were imposed, as the Spanish noted, with no care for local feelings.⁵ On 9 August, al-Baḡar ordered the Banū Ziyāt to prepare straw for the animals of a Rifī army that was about to arrive. The Spanish Intelligence Service reckoned that this was no more than attempt to frighten his charges.⁶ It was probably not necessary, for the

¹ Skīraj, op. cit., pp. 102-103.

² SHM Ceuta Leg. 20, Información Oficina Central, Julio de 1923, nota, 19 July 1923.

³ Ibid., nota, 23 July 1923, and 27 July 1923, and Skīraj. op. cit., p. 103.

⁴ SHM Ceuta Leg. 20, Información Oficina Central, Agosto de 1923, nota, 6 Aug. 1923, and Skīraj, op. cit., p. 103.

⁵ SHM Ceuta Leg. 20, Información Oficina Central, Agosto de 1923, nota, 8 Aug. 1923.

⁶ Ibid., nota, 9 Aug. 1923.

Ghumārīs seem to have been sufficiently cowed by this time anyway. When the Banū Manṣūr and Banū Bū Zrā complained about two Rifīs whom they had caught red-handed with two local women, and demanded that they be executed "as happens in the Rif if a Gomari commits a crime [of this nature]," they were practically ignored, for the Rifīs escaped with a beating.¹ The Ghumārīs had to contain themselves, for the forces against them were overwhelming. For instance, Sī Tuhāmī al-Wazzānī had 600 men from his own tribe at his disposal, under the watchful eyes of two Rifīs and 30 men from the Rifī regular army. Spanish Intelligence described these two men as "interventores", drawing a parallel between them and the Spanish officers appointed to oversee the work of local qā'ids in the occupied tribes.²

At this time the Rifīs were collecting support in a number of other tribes. Groups in the Raḥūna, a tribe to the west of the Ghazāwa, and the Maziyyat, sent contingents of 100 men from each tribe to bin 'Abd al-Karīm for service on the eastern front.³ At the risk of being slightly anachronistic, it is worth looking at the case of the Maziyyat a little more carefully. This is a small tribe, centred on Tawnāt in what was undeniably part of the French zone, although it was not yet occupied. In November 1923 some of the a'yān (who typically described themselves as "all the a'yān") wrote to the Spanish to explain their relations with the Rifīs:

"We inform your excellency that we have opened relations with Wuld al-Sayyid 'Abd al-Karīm because of our fear of the French who are getting close to our lands and we have written to him, proclaiming him . . . [We swear] by God alone that our tribe and that of the Sinhāja [i.e., presumably, the Sinhāja Misbuḥ, a neighbouring tribe] want only your government and we are opposed to Wuld al-Sayyid 'Abd al-Karīm, whom we do not want in our country . . ."¹

¹ Ibid., nota, 13 Aug. 1923.

² Ibid., and nota, 14 Aug. 1923.

³ Ibid., nota, 18 Aug. 1923.

This initial impression of favouring the Spanish is, however, rather spoilt by a subsequent appeal to release a member of their tribe whom the Spanish had imprisoned.² However, it seems quite likely that the Maziyyat had decided to join the Rifis in the hope that they would escape the attentions of the French, for a while at least.

Far more importantly for the Rifī cause, they gained an ally in Aḥmad b. Muḥammad Isbū of the Banū Huzmār, more commonly known by the name of Akhrīrū.³ He had been a principal supporter of al-Raisūlī and one of his more trusted leaders. However, in August 1923 he quarrelled with al-Raisūlī, for reasons that are unclear.⁴ Following this ¹ SHM Ceuta Leg. 19, Cartas Arabes, All the a'yān of Maziyyat to Governor of Shāwin, 11 Rabī' II 1342/20 Nov. 1923.

² Ibid.

³ The spelling of this name has a number of different versions. The one used here is that of al-Bū 'Ayyāshī (op. cit., Vol. II, p. 212), who gives the vocalisation of the name in some detail. It is often written Khariru, or even Kheriro, Jeriro, or Heriro, etc.

⁴ SHM Ceuta Leg. 20, Información Oficina Central, Agosto 1923, nota, 24 Aug. 1923. The date at least is clear--this report was confirmed by the British Acting Vice-Consul in Tetuan, who gives the Spanish version of the reason. According to this, when the Spanish handed back part of the lands they had confiscated from al-Raisūlī, Akhrīrū claimed that he owned some of it. The Spanish refused to back him, so "Gueriro [sic] seeing the hopelessness of obtaining justice, openly rebelled against Raisuli and the Spanish authorities." (FO 371/9470/W7244/44/28, Morillo to Codrington, Tetuan, 30 Aug. 1923). Rupert Furneaux, Abdel Krim, Emir of the Rif (London, 1967), p. 113, has another version. According to him, Akhrīrū and al-Raisūlī quarrelled over the sharing of booty after a raid. This is quite obviously nonsense (Furneaux is very frequently wrong over details) since he places it after the coup d'état in Spain in mid-September 1923, and states that al-Raisūlī was trying to take advantage of the confusion caused by the coup, whereas in reality he quarrel Akhrīrū went back to the Banū Huzmār and made contact with al-'Abī "Sinwana" (sic) of the 'Anjara tribe, north of the Tangier to Tetuan road, and Wuld al-Asba'ia of the Hawz.¹ The links with these tribes were to prove of great use later. On 22 August, Akhrīrū, together with a group of supporters, carried out a daring night-time raid into Tetuan itself, penetrating to the very centre of the city.² At the end of August, he brought two leaders of the Banū Aḥmad, one of them a sharīf of the zawiya of al-'Arab, into alliance with the Rifis.³

By the beginning of September, bin 'Abd al-Karīm's authority was almost secure in the Ghumāra. The Rifis were able to call upon it as a reserve for troops, and Bū Laḥya was sent there for the purpose of recruitment.⁴ However, when Bū Laḥya moved into the Akhmās in mid-September, he was expelled after a few days.⁵

At the end of September 1923, therefore, the Rifis could count on controlling some of the Sinhāja and most of the Ghumāra--with the exception of the Spanish posts on the coasts and in the Wādī Lāw valley. This political and was desperately anxious for the support of the new government. Al-Bū 'Ayyāshī (op. cit., Vol. II, p. 212) rightly dismisses this, but then goes on to claim that it was (a) after the coup itself and (b) the result of a raid carried out by Akhrīrū on Tetuan, for which he was pursued by al-Raisūlī's nephew 'Alī, thus showing up the "treachery" of the al-Raisūlī family towards the resistance to the Spanish.

¹ SHM Ceuta Leg. 20, Información Oficina Central, Agosto de 1923, nota, 24 Aug. 1923.

² Ibid., nota, 25 Aug. 1923, and al-Bū 'Ayyāshī, op. cit., Vol. II, p. 213.

³ SHM Ceuta Leg. 20, Información Oficina Central, Agosto de 1923, nota, 30 Aug. 1923.

⁴ SHM Melilla Leg. 23, Información Septiembre, Resumen General de Confidencias, 9 Sept. 1923.

⁵ SHM Ceuta Leg. 20, Resumen Política de Larache, 15 de Agosto a 15 de Septiembre de 1923, nota, 13 Sept. 1923, and nota, 16 Sept. 1923.

military advantage was the result of local opposition to the Spanish, of the Rifis' use of force, and of fear of the French. It made up for the relative failure of the action against the Spanish in the east.

The Campaign in the East

After the temporary subjection of 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu and Bil-Qīsh in May 1923 and the retirement of 'Abd al-Mālik to the Spanish zone to take charge of his new ḥarka there, bin 'Abd al-Karīm was able to devote his energies to the Spanish on the eastern front. In fact, things did not work out quite as he wanted.

The first attack came at the beginning of June. 'Abd al-Salām b. al-Ḥājj Muḥand, who had been appointed the first Minister of War in the new Rifī government,¹ had decided on a full attack on the Spanish forward position at Tizzī 'Azzā.² In the first day's fighting, the Spanish suffered heavy casualties--two officers were killed, seven wounded, and there were 100 casualties among the other ranks --mostly Moroccan Regulares.³ In the days that followed, the Rifis made great efforts to take the position. They succeeded in cutting off the supply route to the Spanish position and in denying it access to water. The Spanish replied with gas bombs dropped by their aeroplanes, but the garrison at Tizzī 'Azzā remained under siege and in a desperate situation. Idrīs b. Sa'īd tried to organise negotiations through Azarqān, at the same time as trying to persuade a Rifī to poison bin 'Abd al-Karīm in exchange for a "bucket of money".¹ This was Idrīs b. Sa'Id's last important action, for he was shot a fortnight later. In the event, it was unnecessary, for on 5 June Spanish forces, despite more "heavy losses", broke through to Tizzī 'Azzā with supplies.²

¹ See above, p. 523.

² Skīraj, op. cit., p. 95.

³ The Times, 2 June 1923, p. 11, dated Madrid, 1 June 1923.

This attack proved to be the undoing of 'Abd al-Salām b. al-Ḥājǰ Muḥand as well. He made the mistake of involving himself in political affairs beyond his brief and gave people who had pro-Spanish inclinations permission to visit Idrīs al-Rifī in Tafarsit. Two of these people were genuine spies. They were executed and 'Abd al-Salām was removed from office for his indiscretion, although bin 'Abd al-Karīm apparently recognised that there was no bad intention behind his actions.² Possibly this would not on its own have been enough to end his career, but he had also failed to take Tizzī 'Azzā, and this doubtless sealed his fate.⁴ Other qā'ids were arrested at the same time, including Ḥaddu b. Muḥ Amziyyan, from the same clan as 'Abd al-Salām, the Banū Bū 'Ayyāsh. In all, bin 'Abd al-Karīm was reported to have replaced 42 qā'ids of varying degrees of authority because of their military inadequacies.⁵

However, the strength of the ḥarka on the eastern front did not decline. The ḥarka regrouped at Amzāwrū--a thousand men were there on 22 June, along with 500 in Jabal Yuddīea. Three days later, these had been dispersed between various positions and been joined by more: and over 3,000

¹ Skiraj, op. cit., p. 95.

² The Times, 7 June 1923, dated Madrid, 5 June 1923.

³ Skiraj, op. cit., p. 91.

⁴ Cab. Reb. 1913-1927, p. 32.

⁵ SHM Melilla Leg. 23, Información Julio, Resumen, 3 July, 1923.

men were distributed at various points on the eastern front.¹

Bin 'Abd al-Karīm called for more volunteers at the end of June,² by which time, as a result of the measures he had taken against inefficient and corrupt qā'ids, morale was considerably higher.³ Nevertheless, the purge continued. 'Amar b. Ṣadiq, of the Banū Ḥadhīfa, a man who for long had had links with the Spanish,⁴ was arrested along with others,⁵ and Bil-Qīsh was apparently worried that the same would happen to him.⁶

Bin 'Abd al-Karīm spent most of the month trying to organise the ḥarka against the Spanish. The intention seems to have been to hold the operations at the same time as those in the Ghumāra, possibly in the hope of repeating the victories of July 1921, just two years before. However, there were some difficulties. 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu had involved himself in a feud with 'Abd al-Salām Uld al-Yidrī, and Bū Lahya was sent to the Marnīsa to sort out that problem.⁷ Then the 'Īd al-Kabīr came at the end of July and Bin 'Abd al-Karīm put off all operations until ten days after the festival to give the more distant tribes time to regroup⁸ and to provide 500 men each. Next the al-Maṭālsa

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 23, Información Junio, Sī Muḥammad al-Faḥsī and Muḥammad b. al-Ḥājj 'Alī Ighārbī, 22 June 1923, and Ḥāmid b. Taḥar b. Mukhtār (Banū Sidal), 25 June 1923.

² SHM Melilla Leg. 23, Información Julio, Samuel Benhammu, 1 July 1923.

³ Ibid., Resumen, 3 July 1923.

⁴ See above, p. 174.

⁵ SHM Melilla Leg. 23, Información Julio, Información Batil, 5 July 1923.

⁶ Ibid., Elías Benhammu, 9 July 1923.

⁷ Ibid., Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Qādir al-Faḥsī and Muḥammad b. al-Ḥājj Ighārbī, 14 July 1923.

⁸ Ibid., 'Abd al-Salām al-Fannāssi, 18 July 1923.

started feuding and a representative had to be sent to sort out that quarrel.¹

At the end of August bin 'Abd al-Karīm was showing signs of losing patience with local leaderships. He replaced most of the military commanders he had dismissed at the beginning of the month with people he could trust. Significantly, all these replacements were men from the central Rif, with the exception of Idrīs b. Mimūn Khūjja of the Banū Bū Ifrūr and Muḥammad b. Taḥar of the Banū Shikār. Even some of the tribal qā'ids were replaced, and Sī 'Amar Bū 'Azzā of the Banū Waryaghal was appointed over the remaining part of the Banū Sa'id that was not under Spanish domination.²

To accompany the reorganisation of the military command, bin 'Abd al-Karīm decided to impose a tighter control on recruitment. In mid-August, he gave up calling for ḥarkas in the markets and instructed his qā'ids to organise them through conscription at once.³ The adoption of a policy of compulsion was immediately successful, troops were raised and the offensive began again on 19 August.

There were heavy attacks on Afrāw on the first day and then even more serious action against the Spanish position at Tifarwīn, a few miles to the south-west.⁴ A large Rifi ḥarka arrived on 21 August,⁵ but it was too late to

¹ Ibid., Información Batil, 30 July 1923.

² Ibid., 'Abd al-Qādir Wuld Sāḥimī, 30 July 1923.

³ SHM Melilla Leg. 20, Información Agosto, Sī Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Qādir al-Faḥsī, 13 Aug. 1923.

⁴ The Times, 20 aug. 1923, p. 10, dated Madrid, 19 Aug. 1923; 21 Aug. 1923, p. 8, dated Madrid, 20 Aug. 1923; 22 Aug. 1923, p. 8, dated Madrid, 21 Aug. 1923.

⁵ SHM Melilla Leg. 20, Información Agosto, 'Abd al-Qādir Wuld Sāḥimī, 22 Aug. 1923.

help in action, for Tifarwīn was relieved on 22 August with the loss of 800 Spanish casualties.¹ Despite the failure of the attack more Rifī forces moved into the area. By the end of the month there were at least 2,500 men in the Banū Walishak and Banū Tūzīn alone.²

Certainly the campaign had failed, but the Spanish had only just saved their positions. As a result of the purges of inefficient and corrupt ḥarka leaders and qā'ids, and the far greater level of mobilisation achieved during the campaign, the eastern front was made firm at a time when the campaign for the Ghumāra was about to begin.

Conclusion

The period between the proclamation of bin 'Abd al-Karīm in January 1923 and September of the same year was spent, on the Rifī side, in strengthening his authority in the Rif and in enforcing it in the Ghumāra. In the Rif, 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu and Bil-Qīsh were defeated and forced to join the Rifī forces. It is important to realise just what happened here. From the point of view of bin 'Abd al-Karīm, 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu and Bil-Qīsh were rebels who refused to recognise his authority in the Rif; from their own point of view they were not, for, until they were forced to, they did not recognise the validity of the state at all. They chose to opt out of the new state, to remain independent of the Rifīs and rely on Spanish support for their autonomy. However, in choosing to opt out of the Rifī state, 'Amar bin Ḥamīdu, Bil-Qīsh and others were forced to rely for their strength on local alliances, and because they did not control the security of the area where the ḥaqq-fines still obtained, they were vulnerable to the unified authority of bin 'Abd al-Karīm. This was not, therefore, a civil war between two contenders for power within the Rīfī state, but a war of expansion carried out by the central Rīfī tribes at the expense of the Marnīsa and Gaznaya. The same is true of the Ghumāra, where the situation was even clearer. Although the Rīfīs were joined by powerful supporters--Tuhāmī al-Wazzānī in the Banū Khālīd and Akhrīrū, a renegade from al-Raisūlī --the main effort was made through bringing Rīfī troops into the area in July and August, crushing the revolt against Rīfī taxation. By the end of September, the Rīfīs held the Ghumāra, with the exception of scattered Spanish posts, principally along the coast. This was done by force, just as the defeat of 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu had been achieved. Bin 'Abd al-Karīm relied on force more and more, for it was the only way to take control--efforts at buying support were as ineffective for him as they had been for the Spanish. As a result, the Rīfīs began to act as an army of occupation in the Ghumāra, burning houses and raping women. They did not, by and large, control the Jibāla, which was largely still under the waning control of al-Raisūlī or of the Spanish but the Rīfīs could control the northern Sinhājan tribes through their alliance with the Akhamlīshīn, although they had not yet expanded into the southern Sinhāja, nor into the large Banū Zarwāl tribe to the south-west. As the eastern line proved to be unassailable, this was obviously the direction for one of the next moves of expansion and conquest.

¹ The Times, 23 Aug. 1923, p. 10, dated Madrid, 22 Aug. 1923, and 24 Aug. 1923, p. 8, dated Madrid, 23 Aug. 1923.

² SHM Melilla, Leg. 20, Información Agosto, Información de Tafarsit, 23 Aug. 1923, and Muḥammad b. Taḥar b. Mukhtār, 27 Aug. 1923.

The other direction was towards the Jibāla, where the Spanish were largely on the defensive. Here there were two opponents--the Spanish, and some of the Jibālīs themselves, who, encouraged by al-Raisūlī, would oppose them.

The fact remains that bin 'Abd al-Karīm was quite clearly on the offensive. He was more and more self-confident, and his propaganda reflected this. In mid-July he sent a letter of encouragement to the Akhamlīshīn in Zarqāt and Targīst, and to Qā'id Kuyās of the Zarqāt, telling them to call a meeting with Sinhāja tribes of Taghzūt and Kitāma. This was done, and a letter from him was read. Bin 'Abd al-Karīm laid great emphasis on the support he said he was receiving from the Turks. He had rejected four Spanish peace offers on Turkish instructions. The Turks had sent him money and, significantly, a flag. Turkish boats were coming in two months to unload supplies on the coasts of the Buqquya and Banū bū Frāḥ. To prove his point, he sent Turkish coins with the letter. This, he said, was a war to protect Islām, but there followed a piece of secular nationalism. They should learn from history, he said. Spain had thrown them out of the Iberian peninsula, robbed them of great works of art and literature, "vexed" their women, and sacked their homes; now "Spain has come to Morocco with the same intentions, and a few years after they have occupied all the tribes, it will do the same things."¹ It is doubtful whether his audience knew very much of art or literature, but that is not the point. The lost treasures of al-Andalus had been used in the past as a symbol of traditional enmity with Spain, and they were so used here.

¹ Ibid., 'Abd al-Salām al-Fannāssī, 18 July 1923.

The self-confidence was well justified, for bin 'Abd al-Karīm's personal authority was growing stronger all the time. He had been proclaimed as amīr al-mu'minīn in January and February 1923 and by August of the same year his authority was almost unchallengeable in the Rif. From now on, the rôle of bin 'Abd al-Karīm as an individual became more and more distinct. It was he who gave instructions to the qā'ids to raise conscripted troops and he, on his personal initiative, who replaced a large proportion of those qā'ids, and other officials, with people he trusted. An example of this is the removal of 'Abd al-Salām bin al-Ḥājj Muḥand as Minister of War. 'Abd al-Salām was one of the few members of the top level of the government who was not in some way related to the amīr. He was replaced by a brother-in-law, and cousin of bin 'Abd al-Karīm, Sī Aḥmad Bū Drā'. There was a perfectly good reason for this change of command--the political errors of 'Abd al-Salām; nevertheless, it had the result of further centering authority onto the amīr and his immediate family. The Rifi movement had already moved far away from an alliance of tribes against the Spanish towards a government controlled from above by the members of one important family, aided by certain individuals from outside. It was another example of the progress towards the formation of a government in the style of the makhzan in the Rif, and one which depended greatly on the use of coercion, rather than agreement.

In the months that followed, this coercive power would be turned against the Jibāla and the people of that region would be obliged to join the Rifi state. There would be no way of resisting the coercive pressure of the Rifis because the Spanish forces in the Jibāla would themselves be ejected from the area under the attack of a superior Rifi army.

Chapter XI

THE EXPANSION OF THE RĪFĪ STATE

"I exerted myself to the utmost to free my land from the influence of the shaykhs of the orders who are an obstacle in the way of any sort of freedom and independence . . . [they] were the bitterest enemies both of myself and of the progress of my country. They omitted nothing in their efforts to frustrate my policy . . ."

Bin 'Abd al-Karīm speaking in 1927 of his quarrel with the ṭarīqas.¹

"As for the people of the Ghumāra, they are greatly afflicted by the taxes which they have to give, by hunger and so on . . ."

The economic conditions in the Ghumāra under Rīfī occupation, described by the pro-Spanish khalīfa of the Banū Bū Zrā, February 1924.²

"The tribe of the Banū Warrayn, who have emigrated in the cause of God, earnestly desire to be under your command, and to join you, to seek refuge with you from the enemies of God, the French, under your rule which is based on the pure sharī'a . . ."

Five of the leaders of the Banū Warrayn confederacy in the Middle Atlas, south of Taza writing to bin 'Abd al-Karīm in April 1924.³

¹ Speaking in an interview in Al-Manār, Vol. 27, pt. 8, 1344-5 A.H., p. 632.

² SHM Ceuta Leg. 22, Bajalato del Gomara, khalīfa of the Banū Bū Zrā to Castro Girona, 1 Rajab 1342/7 Feb. 1924.

³ MAEF, Maroc 517, p. 275, SI Maḥammad b. Muḥammad al-'Alāwī al-Warraynī al-Tijānī, Sīdī Raḥū, Sīdī 'Alī Sha'ib b. Muḥand and Aḥmad Tamast to Muḥammad bin 'Abd al-Karīm, 6 Ramaḍān 1342/11 Apr. 1924.

The economic situation described by the khalīfa of the Banū Bū Zrā applied not only in the Ghumāra but also in much of the rest of the Rif. As a result, bin 'Abd al-Karīm was obliged to look for ways of expanding into areas that he did not yet control and which offered supplies of agricultural products. Such an area was the land of Banū Zarwāl; but the attempt to annex this tribe brought bin 'Abd al-Karīm into contact with the powerful leader of the Darqāwiya ṭarīqa 'Abd al-Raḥmān. The resulting battles led to a full-scale revolt in the Ghumāra, but one which the Rifi forces were quite able to contain and then put down with considerable ferocity. In the Jibāla, from where the Spanish forces withdrew in late 1924, another rebellion started, encouraged by another religious leader, al-Raisūlī. These moves to resist the expanding Rifi state explain bin 'Abd al-Karīm's dislike of the ṭarīqas. However, although both sides attacked each other using religious language, it was not really religion but power which was at issue. Bin 'Abd al-Karīm's increasing authority threatened the power and prestige of leaders both religious and secular. Al-Raisūlī and 'Abd al-Raḥmān were not the only people to oppose bin 'Abd al-Karīm, for others, like 'Amar bin Ḥamīdu tried to do so as well. With the exception of 'Abd al-Raḥmān--and even his success was only temporary--they all failed, because bin 'Abd al-Karīm was so powerful that there was little or no chance of success.

In fact, bin 'Abd al-Karīm appeared so strong that the new state attracted the attention of people fighting the French in their zone of Morocco. These people looked towards bin 'Abd al-Karīm for help. However, apart from a few minor brushes with French troops, bin 'Abd al-Karīm did nothing to help them for the moment, and concentrated on pushing the remaining Spanish troops out of the Jibāla.

However, all was not entirely easy for the Rifis. Their military problems, caused by 'Abd al-Raḥmān and al-Raisūlī amongst others, were aggravated by the economic situation in the Rif. So, before discussing the military events, it is necessary to survey the economic conditions.

The Economic Situation--The Climatic Background

As we have seen, the economy of the Rif was based on agriculture, and this was dependent on the vagaries of the climate. Rainfall, which had been the determining factor on the harvests and consequently the level of resistance before the war, seems to have been good during the 1922-1924 period. Of course, rainfall statistics were not kept by bin 'Abd al-Karīm's government, still less were they published in meteorological journals. However, an overall impression may be gained by examining the returns of the nearest meteorological stations to the Rif: at Melilla and Tetuan.

Between 1921 and 1924, the rains came with the expected regularity and with little fluctuation between the rainy seasons--although there was, of course, wild fluctuation during each year. The important rainfall, which had to be maintained, was that between October and March each year. In comparison with the rainfall during these months in the years before the Rif war, the years 1923 and 1924 fared well (see table XI: 1 and 2).

Table XI: 1Rainfall at Melilla, 1 October to 31 March¹

1915-16	300.5 mm
1916-17	407.0 mm
1917-18	335.6 mm
1918-19	223.3 mm
1919-20	198.9 mm
1920-21	291.1 mm
1921-22	404.0 mm
1922-23	408.2 mm
1923-24	503.2 mm
1924-25	318.6 mm
1925-26	313.8 mm

Average over 11 years, 336.75 mm

Average for Melilla, 1 October to 31 March over years 1923-34 and 1943-55: 304.7 mm.²

The same pattern may be seen in the Tetuan returns:

Table XI: 2Rainfall at Tetuan, 1 October to 31 March³

1918-19	391.6 mm
1-19-20	(record incomplete)
1920-21	422.4 mm
1921-22	450.0 mm
1922-23	574.3 mm
1923-24	645.8 mm
1924-25	682.6 mm
1925-26	848.8 mm

Average over 8 recorded years, 569.4 mm.

¹ Dirección General del Instituto Geográfico y Catastral, Resumen de las observaciones efectuadas en las estaciones del Servicio Meteorológico Español durante el año (Madrid, 1915-26) (Annual publication) (henceforth referred to as "Resumen de la observaciones").

² Meteorological Office, Tables of Temperature, Relative Humidity and Precipitation for the World, Part IV, Africa, the Atlantic Ocean south of 35°N, and the Indian Ocean (London, 1967), p. 6.

³ Resumen de las observaciones, passim.

These figures, incomplete though they are, show that rainfall increased during the winters of the first three years of the Rifi state from 1921-1922 to 1923-1924 and then dropped off slightly in the eastern Rif in 1924-1925, and further in 1925-1926, while they increased in the Jibāla and the west. In neither 1923 nor 1924 was there any rain while the grain was ripening, so, with these favourable weather conditions it might have been thought that the harvests in both 1923 and 1924 would have been good. This was indeed the case in 1923--but definitely not in 1924. Since the weather was favourable, other explanations for the collapse of the 1924 harvest must be found.

The Lost Harvest

As might have been expected, given the weather pattern over the previous winter, the harvest of early summer 1923 was excellent.¹ The Banū Waryaghāl were reported to be trying to collect in their crops before any of the other tribes, and before the price of grain dropped as a result of it being so plentiful. The price of grain at this stage was put at 10 pts the mudd. Although bin ‘Abd al-Karīm followed the example of the traditional Moroccan makhzans and never appointed a wazīr to take charge of agriculture, he did make efforts to ensure that the grain was properly used. In July 1923, he gave orders that the mills in the Timsamān which had fallen into disrepair during the fighting should now be put into order ready for use.³ It seems . . .

¹ The Times, 2 May 1923, p. 13, dated Tangier, 1 May 1923.

² SHM Melilla Leg. 22, Información Mayo, T.O.C. Comandante Interventor to Coronel de Tropas de Policía, Tafarsit, 20 May 1923.

³ SHM Melilla Leg. 22, Información Julio, information of Muḥammad b. al-Ḥājj ‘Amar (Banū Sidal), 24 July 1923.

likely that he gave similar instructions elsewhere. Despite the generally excellent harvest, bin 'Abd al-Karīm also tried to stockpile as much grain as possible, and in June, he wrote to people in the Spanish-occupied zone offering to buy their harvest as well.¹

That autumn, however, was not a good one for agriculture, for there were too many other tasks which also needed to be carried out. The eastern front had to be reinforced, from just over 1,000 men in September 1924² to over 3,500 by December.³ These figures may not be exact but they do indicate an enormous mobilisation of troops. At the same time, there was road building to organise--and although some of this was done by bin 'Abd al-Karīm's prisoners, they could hardly do all of it, and there were defence works to be dug, and so on. Above all, there was the regular army to be formed and trained. These were all reasons why the Rifis found it difficult to make time for sowing. The Spanish disrupted things even further. The frequency of air attacks added to the Rifis' difficulties.

Spanish bombing raids, in fact, seriously damaged the economy of the Rif. Market sites were moved--in the Banū Walishak, for instance, all the daily markets were shifted to Ait 'Abd al-'Azīz in January 1924 and were held on Friday and Monday only.⁴ In the Banū Tūzīn, in an effort

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 22, Información Junio, Oficina de Intervención, Beni Bu Yahy, Capt. Interventor to Coronel Jefe de Intervención, 4 June 1923.

² SHM Melilla Leg. 22, Información Septiembre, Resumen General de Confidencias, 14 Sept. 1922.

³ SHM Melilla Leg. 22, Información Diciembre, Sīdī Idrīs b. al-Bashīr, 3 Dec. 1922.

⁴ SHM Melilla Leg. 24, Informaciones Enero, Resumen General de Confidencias, 21 Jan. 1924.

to avoid this disruption from air raids, the important market at Azilāf was held at night, as was the lesser Friday market of Ihababan.¹ However, the bombs certainly did not stop the Rifis from attacking the Spanish in the west, or anywhere else for that matter. Nor did they break the will of the Rifis to carry on fighting, for in addition to inaccuracies of the Spanish pilots,² the Rifis had long learned to cope with Spanish bombs. As early as February 1922, some enterprising people in the Banū Sa'īd at Bū Irmāna, Talat and other places had turned the air-raids to good profit by digging air-raid shelters and then charging 50 cts to anyone who used their shelter to take refuge from the aeroplanes. It became a "new industry" for a short while.³

However, while the Rifis were not too concerned about conventional bombs, the Spanish poison gas bombs, which they began to put into use at the end of May, terrified them. Fleming quotes a Spanish operations report on one raid (which I did not see) as follows:

"As a consequence it is known that 15 indigenous were left partially blind, some of these have remained completely blind, and other indigenous, who were close to the site of the explosion, suffered burns, accompanied by nausea which lasted three hours. Other tribesmen who reached the bombed areas some hours later could still feel the burning effects of the gas. The post-bomb reaction is one of panic and fear that the bombing will be repeated."⁴

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 24, Información Febrero, Resumen General de Confidencias, 23 Feb. 1924.

² Sheean, visiting the Rif in 1924, noted that many of the Spanish bombs were dropped on completely empty countryside, Adventures, pp. 53-54.

³ SMM Melilla Leg. 20, Información Febrero, Minuta para la información de hoy, 27 Feb. 1922.

⁴ Fleming, op. cit., p. 141, quoting SHM Material as explained on p. xiv. Fleming's citation of these archives are not easily followed.

Political decisions also seem to have made economic life in the Rif difficult. In February 1923, as part of his moves for greater independence after his proclamation, bin 'Abd al-Karīm declared that henceforth no Spanish money was to be used in the Rif. Only French or "Moroccan" (i.e., Ḥassanni) money was to be tendered.¹ In fact, this decree seems to have been widely ignored: people did not stop trading with the Spanish zone--which was presumably the intention--as a result. But there was a shift in the emigration patterns anyway. It had become even more profitable to work in the French zone of Morocco or Algeria because of the disruption caused by the war in the north, and large numbers left both the Spanish and Rifī zones despite bin 'Abd al-Karīm's best efforts to stop them. In September 1923, 22 men from the Banū Walishak were reported to have been arrested in the Rifī controlled zone on their return from Algeria.² This is only an example, for overall figures are not available. They must have been large, however, for on 30 January 1924 alone, some 20,000 French francs were changed in the Spanish controlled market of Sūq al-Arba'a of Harrayg in the Banū Bū Yaḥyī.³ Bin 'Abd al-Karīm tried, again, to stop the emigration in April 1924, and threatened severe punishments for anyone who went to the French zone to work on the land.⁴ Nevertheless, many Maṭālsīs left for the Gharb plain in the west to work the following month.⁵

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 22, Información Febrero, Sī Muḥammad al-Faḥsī and Muḥammad Agharbī, 15 Feb. 1923.

² SHM Melilla Leg. 24, Información Enero, Muḥ Qaddur Tahar, 21 Jan. 1924.

³ Ibid., Resumen General, 31 Jan. 1924.

⁴ SHM Melilla Leg. 24, Información Abril, Resumen General, 6 Apr. 1924.

⁵ SHM Melilla Leg. 25, Información Confidentes, A'īsa b. al-Ḥājj, 24 May, 1924.

Bin 'Abd al-Karīm attempted to prevent not only people from leaving the Rīf, but foodstuffs as well. In February 1924, he forbade the export of eggs and chickens to the Spanish occupied zone.¹ In an effort to ensure that food supplies to the troops were maintained, he expropriated 50 baggage animals from the Timsamān and 40 from the Banū Walishak and ordered that they be kept to take supplies to the harkas--especially of bread.² In a further attempt to assure his supplies, he reopened commercial relations with the French as soon as the skirmishing with their zone was over in June 1924,³ and forbade any further attacks on the French zone in order to keep commerce open.⁴ The caravans from the French zone were of some importance--and indeed were encouraged by Gabrielli, the French Controlleur-civil at Tawriat, as a way of collecting information about the Rīf.⁵

Nevertheless, these measures did not help the Rīfian economy. The harvest of 1924 was poor. Bin 'Abd al-Karīm tried to stockpile as much as he could, and as it was harvested, it was moved up into the Banū Waryaghal.⁶ It was needed for the army, of course, and this meant that there was even less available for the rest of the population. By September 1924, barley was becoming expensive.⁷ By October 1924, prices were

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 24, Información Febrero, Resumen General, 21 Feb. 1924.

² SHM Melilla Leg. 25, Información Confidentes, nota, 9 May 1924.

³ SHM Melilla Leg. 25, Informaciones Junio, Resumen General, 29 June 1924.

⁴ SHM Melilla Leg. 25, Informaciones Julio, Resumen General, 9 July, 1924.

⁵ Gabrielli, op. cit., p. 4.

⁶ SHM Melilla Leg. 25, Información Batel, nota, 8 July 1924.

⁷ SHM Melilla Leg. 25, Información Septiembre, nota, 16 Sept. 1924.

very high. Exact comparisons are difficult, because at this stage of the war Spanish Intelligence reports only occasionally mentioned prices. However, a pattern is visible. Barley and wheat cost 12 pts a mudd and 25 pts a mudd respectively,¹ as against 10 pts a mudd for barley in May 1923,² a 20% rise in barley over one year which is high but not excessive. Sugar rose from 2.50pts a pilón in April 1922,³ when the Spanish lines had been finally stabilised, to 4 pts a pilón in October 1924,⁴ a 60% rise. However, compared with the period at the height of the Rifi successes in August 1921, the inflation was enormous. Then, in August 1921, eggs were valued at 2 pts a hundred.⁵ Now, in October 1924, they were 13 pts a hundred,⁶ a rise of 550%, an overall average of 169% a year.

By October 1924, because of bombing, bad harvests and economic disruption, there was considerable hardship in the Rif. Bin 'Abd al-Karim made an attempt at rationing barley by ordering that it was only to be sold to those authorised by him,⁷ thereby incidentally increasing the degree of centralisation in the Rif. But the needs of the war came before agriculture. In December 1924, bin 'Abd al-Karim

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 25, Información Batel, nota, 26 Oct. 1924.

² SHM Melilla Leg. 22, Información Mayo, T.O.C. Comandante Interventor to Cor. Tropas de Policía, Tafarsit, 20 May 1923.

³ SHM Melilla Leg. 20, Información de la 8a Mía, Abril 1922, Información, Dār Drīūsh, 3 Apr. 1922.

⁴ SHM Melilla Leg. 25, Información Batel, nota, 26 Oct. 1924.

⁵ SHM Melilla Leg. 18, Información Agosto, Sultan, 9 Aug. 1921.

⁶ SHM Melilla Leg. 25, Información Batel, nota, 26 Oct. 1924.

⁷ SHM Melilla Leg. 25, Información Octubre, nota, 22 Oct. 1924.

ordered that there be no further sowing, because all the men were needed for the ḥarka.¹ This was despite the refusal of many Rifis, at the end of November, to send ḥarkas to the Jibāla because of the misery in their own tribes.² Indeed, rather than join the victorious ḥarkas for the west, or garrison the eastern front, by the beginning of December 1924, people were again emigrating to find work, precisely so that they could avoid service in the ḥarkas.³

However, it was during this bleak economic period that the Rifī state achieved its most rapid period of growth, attacking first of all the lands of the Banū Zarwāl, then the Jibāla. While the expansion was not altogether successful in the case of the Banū Zarwāl, it was quite the reverse in the Jibāla. Here, the Spanish were forced to evacuate all their troops and bin 'Abd al-Karīm imposed his authority, crushing first of all a revolt in the Ghumāra and then one in the Akhmās in the process, notwithstanding the tension caused by the economic situation. Partly this was the result of Spanish weakness but it was also the product of the growing Rifī strength pointed to in the last chapter.

The Spanish Directory and Morocco

When he gained power in September 1923, Primo de Rivera set up a "Military Directory" to take over the government of Spain; staffed by "advisers"--army officers who were inferior to himself in rank--rather than ministers, originally for a maximum period of ninety days. In fact, the dictatorship lasted much longer, until 1930.¹ In one of his first announcements he promised to find a "swift, worthy, and sensible" solution to the Moroccan war.²

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 25, Información Diciembre, nota, 9 Dec. 1924.

² SHM Melilla Leg. 25, Información Noviembre, nota, 27 Nov. 1924.

³ SHM Melilla Leg. 25, Información Diciembre, nota, 6 Dec. 1924.

On taking power, he at once replaced the civilian High Commissioner, Luís Silvela, with a general Luís Aizpuru y Mondejar, who had considerable experience of Morocco--he had been Comandante General of Melilla from 1915 to 1919--and who had been Minister of War in the García Prieto government which the coup had overthrown. However, despite the ending of the civil Protectorate in Morocco, Primo neither sought nor wanted a great military expansion in Morocco. On 16 December, he said:

"The military character of the movement excites the suspicion . . . that everything there [i.e., in Morocco] will be done by military action, giving way to an era of permanent war. This suspicion is both reasonable and logical, although it is quite incorrect."³

Morocco, he said, needed two things: "A plan, and silence."⁴

His plan was to try to cut down on the amount of money being spent in Morocco and to withdraw as many of the conscripted troops as possible. This was done--29,000 troops were sent home in December 1923 before their term of conscription had expired.⁵

In an effort to maintain control in the Jibāla, Primo at first looked to al-Raisūlī. Al-Raisūlī was equally anxious to make a deal with the Spanish. His authority had

¹ Payne, Politics and the Military, pp. 202-204.

² Ibid., p. 208.

³ Quoted in Gómez-Jordana y Souza, op. cit., p. 55.

⁴ Ibid., p. 56.

⁵ Payne, Politics and the Military, p. 209.

been much eroded by the Rīfī gains in the Ghumāra, and he was anyway a sick man--his body was so bloated with dropsy that he had difficulty in moving. He was caught in a vicious political circle, his prestige was evaporating in the eyes of the Jibālīs because of his dealings with Spain, and yet he could only hope to maintain his power now with Spanish support. Not surprisingly he made rapid efforts to show himself friendly towards the new dictator. On 17 September he wrote to Primo offering his unconditional friendship and help in fighting the Rīfīs. A conference between the two was arranged in October, but this reached no definite agreement. Al-Raisūlī really hoped that he would be made khalīfa of the Spanish zone when Mūlāy al-Maḥdī, who was sick, died, and indeed when the Mūlāy al-Maḥdī did die, on 24 October 1923, he considered that his chance had come.¹ It was impossible, however--the French were decidedly against it, for one thing, and for another, al-Raisūlī's prestige had sunk too low for it to be worthwhile.

Primo also attempted to negotiate with bin 'Abd al-Karīm. Through Echevarrieta, the Basque millionaire who had negotiated the return of the prisoners in January 1923, and the Tunisian Shaykh al-Tijānī, he offered bin 'Abd al-Karīm the office of "Amir of the Rif", with a salary and internal self-government, in return for an exchange of prisoners and a surrender of arms.² The offer had been made before, after the battle at Abarrān³ and now Primo was negotiating from a position of even greater weakness and bin

¹ Fleming, op. cit., pp. 113-114; and The Times, 25 Oct. 1923, p. 11, dated Madrid, 24 Oct. 1923.

² Fleming, op. cit., pp. 117-118.

³ See above, 318.

'Abd al-Karīm knew it, and refused.

In January 1924, therefore, Primo proceeded to a reorganisation of the Protectorate. In the Melilla Comandancia he created a "vanguard zone" protected by the forward positions which were, somewhat ironically, named the "Silvestre Line", with prepared defences to which troops could safely fall back if necessary.

The administration was reorganised as well. A new government department, the Moroccan Office, was set up to take over all responsibility for Morocco, and the High Commissioner was made Commander-in-Chief of the army in the Protectorate once again, reversing the trend towards a civil Protectorate.¹

The military problems were still daunting, for while it was feasible to build a line along the eastern foothills of the Rif to protect the occupied plains behind, such a policy was more difficult in the Jibāla, a much more irregular and mountainous area altogether. Here the Spanish forces occupied hundreds of small blockhouses and positions which were difficult to protect once the surrounding tribes had risen. Primo realised this and wanted to initiate a policy of semi-abandonment, by which Spanish forces would retreat to secure lines. Behind these lines the inhabitants would be disarmed and protected and the peace and security in the occupied area would serve as a focus of attraction for the unoccupied tribes. A similar plan, on a smaller scale, was proposed for the eastern zone.²

Such a plan, understandably, was not welcomed by the leaders of the African army. The Africanistas (supporters of an aggressive policy in Morocco) argued in the press against withdrawal, particularly in the Revista de Tropas Coloniales, where Generals Quiapo de Llano, Lt. Col. Millán Astray, founder of the Foreign Legion, and Lt. Col. Francisco Franco, future dictator of Spain, all argued in critical and sometimes emotional terms against any withdrawal. The Revista was eventually curbed, but resistance from the army, and particularly from the commanders of the eastern zone, continued. As a result, Primo agreed to withdraw troops only in the western zone.¹ In such circumstances, it was hardly surprising that bin 'Abd al-Karīm and the Rifis decided to take as much advantage of Spanish weakness as they could. The easiest area into which they could expand was that formed by the southern Sinhāja, the Wargha and Banū Zarwāl tribes. Here there were no Spanish posts at all. All that had to be done was to defeat any local opposition. This was, however, more difficult than it seemed.

¹ Fleming, op. cit., pp. 120-122

² Ibid.

The Expansion into the South-West

The Banū Zarwāl is a large tribe south-west of the Sinhāja Srair tribes (see map XI: 1). Its territory was, and is, immensely fertile and rich in agricultural products --olives, grapes, figs, oranges, and in the lowlands corn, barley, wheat, beans, and so on. So rich was it, that the "ancients", according to one writer, named it "jabal al-zabīb", the "mountain of raisins".² Thus it was an attractive prize

¹ Ibid., pp. 150-160.

² Muḥammad al-Bashīr 'Abdallah al-Fāsī al-Fiḥrī, Qabila Banī Zarwāl--maẓāhir ḥayatihā al-thaqāfiya w-al-ijtimā'iya w-al-iqtisādīya (al-Rabat, n.d.), pp. 8-9.

MAP XI: The expansion into the south west and the Ghumara revolt 1924 in the straitened economic circumstances. But it was also a desirable political objective because the Banū Zarwāl was the headquarters of the Darqāwiya ṭarīqa, with its principal centre at Amjūṭṭ in the west of the tribe.

In order to collect this prize, however, the Rifis would have to control all the lands between the Banū Zarwāl and the Rif, which would mean securing absolutely their power in the Marnīsa. This was bound to cause yet more problems with 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu. Secondly, the Rifis would have to secure either the cooperation or the obedience of 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ṭayyib al-Darqāwī, the leader of the ṭarīqa. This would not be an easy task, for 'Abd al-Raḥmān since the First World War had had close links with the French.¹ Thirdly, they would have to compete with the French since the supposed boundary of the French and Spanish Protectorates cut the Banū Zarwāl in two.

At the beginning of September, therefore, bin 'Abd al-Karīm sent two representatives off to the Banū Zarwāl. They were Idrīs b. Mimūn Khuja, one of the few Qal'ayīs whom he still trusted,² and a certain Faqīh Bū Sha'mīr.³ The Banū Zarwāl do not seem to have been very impressed with these emissaries, for a month later some of them wrote to the Spanish "Governor" of Shāwin, Captain Costello, saying that they wanted to be in the Spanish sphere of influence because they were worried about the threat posed by the approaching French armies.⁴ A similar letter came, at the

¹ See above, p. 185.

² See above, p. 629.

³ SHM Melilla Leg. 22, Cartas Arabes, 1, Bani Tuzin, Shaykh 'Allāl b. Muḥand 'Alī to Col. of O.A.I., received 9 Sept. 1923.

⁴ SHM Ceuta Leg. 19, Cartas Arabes, Qā'id Maḥammad al-Murābiṭ, Sayyid 'Abd al-Salām al-Zarbūḥ, and Shaykh.

same time, from another Zarwālī leader, also rejecting any dealings with the French,¹ sentiments similar to those expressed, in November, by the Mazziyyat tribe, which have already been discussed.²

Bin 'Abd al-Karīm clearly had to move with some speed if he was to do anything effective in the Banū Zarwāl. At the beginning of November 1923, he prepared a ḥarka, reportedly of 600 men, with which to overawe the tribes on his route--the Marnīsa and Upper Wargha tribes in particular --and tried to "enchant us with money and other things so that there should be a brotherhood between us and them," as some of the Wargha's pro-Spanish inhabitants put it in a letter to the Spanish.³

At the same time, bin 'Abd al-Karīm strengthened his links with 'Amar bin Ḥamīdū. He already had a telephone line from Ait Qamāra to bin Ḥamīdū's house in the Marnīsa,⁴ and had just started to build a road through the Marnīsa to 'Ain Midyūna as well.⁵ In mid-November, he appointed 'Amar b. Ḥamīdū as Pasha of the Wargha, giving him the authority to appoint qā'ids in the region.⁶ The normal accompaniments of an extension of Rīfī authority--telephones, roads and administration were being introduced into the Marnīsa and al-Ḥassan of the jamā'a of Tazghadra and "all their brothers who are with them" to Capt. governing Shāwin, 10 Oct. 1923.

¹ Ibid., Muḥammad b. al-Ḥājj al-Zarwālī to Capt. Costello, governor of Shāwin, 27 Ṣafar 1342/9 Oct. 1923.

² SHM Ceuta Leg. 19, Cartas Arabes, All the a'yān of Mazziyat to Governor of Shāwin, 11 Rabī'. II1342/20 Nov. 1923. See above, p. 624.

³ SHM Melilla Leg. 22, Cartas Arabes, 2, Marnisa y Wargha, unsigned letter to Col. Coronel, received 5 Nov. 1923.

⁴ SHM Melilla Leg. 23, Información Noviembre, Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Qādir al-Faḥsī, 16 Nov. 1923.

⁵ Ibid., Muḥammad b. al-Ḥājj 'Alī Agharbī, 17 Nov. 1923.

⁶ Ibid., Ḥamīd b. Tahar b. Mukhtār (Banū Sidal), 19 Nov. 1923 and Muḥammad b. Muḥammādī, 23 Nov. 1923.

Upper Wargha tribes.

Rebellion in the Gaznaya and Wargha

Certainly 'Amar bin Ḥamīdu was cooperating fully with bin 'Abd al-Karīm at this stage. At the beginning of September, the amīr called for contingents from the Matīwa al-Baḥar and Banū 'Amārt to go to join him in the Marnīsa, and then move into the territory of the Banū Wanjil in order to subjugate that tribe.¹ However, 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu encountered some opposition from his erstwhile supporters. Ten men were killed in the Wargha in fighting which started when 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu tried to confiscate ḥabus property for use in the war effort. The confiscating of the ḥabus, not surprisingly, excited the opposition of 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Darqāwī in Amjūt, who joined the resistance to the Rifīs. Bin 'Abd al-Karīm sent 200 more men to help 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu. Despite the 300 who were already there under Bū Laḥya, these reinforcements were not enough, and bin 'Abd al-Karīm told Akhamlīsh and Kuyās in the Targīst and Zargāt tribes to organise yet more help to go to the Marnīsa.²

At the same time, the first wave of arrests began in the Marnīsa and Upper Wargha tribes. Qā'id Buḥūt paid a quick visit at the end of November and arrested 17 people, who were taken to the Banū Waryaghal, and the Bū Laḥya column arrested 11 in the tribe of Sinhāja Ghiddu, and two in the Marnīsa.³

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 23, Información Diciembre, Muḥammad b. al-Ḥājj al-Muqaddam, 2 Dec. 1923.

² Ibid., Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Qādir al-Faḥsī, 6 Dec. 1923, and Muḥammad b. al-Ḥājj al-Muqaddam, 7 Dec. 1923, and Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Qādir al-Faḥsī, 14 Dec. 1923.

³ Ibid., Muḥammad Muḥammādī, 7 Dec. 1923, and Muḥammad b. al-Ḥājj Muḥammādī, 7 Dec. 1923.

'Amar b. Ḥamīdu was still working for bin 'Abd al-Karīm and he imposed a heavy fine, allegedly of 80,000 pesetas on the Sinhāja tribes because of the fighting that had taken place when 'Abd al-Mālik was in the area.¹ As 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu had at that time been an ally of 'Abd al-Mālik's, this was an outrageous example of double standards, and the Marnīsīs, not surprisingly, refused to pay.

'Amar bin Ḥamīdu may have been cooperating with bin 'Abd al-Karīm, but his former ally, Bil-Qīsh of the Gaznaya, was not. There had been a certain amount of dissent in both the Gaznaya and Banū Tūzīn during September and October which increased after Idrīs al-Rīfī left the scene. For example, at the beginning of September, Shaykh Aḥmad b. 'Amar of 'Azrū wrote to the Spanish offering to reopen relations;² and Muḥammad Bū Qaddur of the Timsamān continued to write promising to submit when the Spanish advanced,³ although he had done this so many times over the previous five years⁴ that it seems doubtful whether the Spanish paid him much attention. It was in the Gaznaya, and to a lesser extent, the Banū Tūzīn, that the trouble for bin 'Abd al-Karīm lay. It came, as usual, from Bil-Qīsh.

In mid-October a quarrel broke out between Muḥammad b. 'Amar Akhiṭṭu, bin 'Abd al-Karīm's main supporter in the Gaznaya, and his opponents, apparently the result of opposition to the qā'ids appointed by 'Abd al-Karīm.⁵ This . . .

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 23, Información Diciembre, Muḥammad b. al-Ḥājī 'Alī Agharbī, 20 dec. 1923.

² SHM Melilla Leg. 22, Cartas Arabes, l. Igzinnayen, Aḥmad b. 'Amar of 'Azrū to Col. and Gen., "1341", Rec'd. 5 Sept. 1923.

³ Ibid., Timsaman, Muḥammad bū Qaddur to Colonel, 14 Ṣafar 1342/26 Sept. 1923.

⁴ See above, pp. 187-189, 417, for example.

⁵ SHM Melilla Leg. 23, Información Octubre, Resumen General de Confidencias, 10 Oct. 1923.

quarrel ran in parallel with another one in the Banū Waryaghal itself. It had started in mid-September in the clan of Banū Bū 'Ayyāsh and was led by 'Abd al-Salām b. al-Ḥājj Muḥand, the Bū 'Ayyāshī¹ who, a month or so previously, had been sacked as Minister of War.² This struggle, in which the Banū Bū 'Ayyāsh received the help of the Banū 'Aqqī clan of the Banū Tūzīn, resulted in a number of deaths--bin 'Abd al-Karīm had two Bū 'Ayyāshī men shot in mid-October, and on 20 October there was a pitched battle at Arba'a Tawrīrt, in which two men were killed and three wounded.³

Bil-Qīsh, who saw his power being slowly eaten away by the loss of his allies and the increasing power of the Rifī state, took as much advantage of the situation as he could. He refused to help in the ḥarka at Miḍār, and started to plot with various shaykhs of the Wargha tribes against his former ally 'Amar bin Ḥamīdu. At the end of November, he started to fight Akhiṭṭu and later, at the beginning of December, continued his campaign against bin Ḥamīdu.⁴ Later in December, other clans of the Gaznaya decided to submit to the French in the hope of preventing bin 'Abd al-Karīm's power from increasing further, and asked that the extremely

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 23, Información Septiembre, Resumen General, 15 Sept. and Resumen General, 23 Sept. and Resumen General, 25 Sept. 1923.

² See above, p. 627.

³ SHM Melilla Leg. 23, Información Septiembre, Resumen General, 25 Sept. 1923, and Información Octubre, Resumen General, 18 Oct. 1923, and Hart, Aith Waryaghar, p. 316, and SHM Melilla Leg. 22, Cartas Arabes, 1, Timsaman, Muḥammad b. Idrīs al-'Arqūbī to Col. Coronel and Cmdte. Claudin, 18 Rabī' I 1342.

⁴ SHM Melilla Leg. 23, Información Diciembre, Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Qādir al-Faḥsī, 1 Dec. 1923, and Muḥammad b. al-Ḥājj al-Muqaddam, 2 Dec. 1923, and Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Qādir al-Faḥsī, 8 Dec. 1923.

pro-French Qā'id Midbuḥ should rule them.¹ Like the Banū Zarwāl, the Gaznaya was divided by the zonal boundary between the French and the Spanish,² so once again bin 'Abd al-Karīm was brought up against the French.

Not all the Gaznaya were opposed to bin 'Abd al-Karīm, however. In mid-December there were still about 4,000 Gaznayīs on the eastern front.³ For the moment, 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu was cooperating with bin 'Abd al-Karīm but this situation did not last.

On 16 January 1924 it was reported that Muḥammad Buḥūt, who had been collecting a ḥarka in the Jibāla, had been ordered by bin 'Abd al-Karīm to arrest 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu. The reasons for this order are unclear, but the attempt was singularly unsuccessful, for 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu arrested Buḥūt instead, and troops had to be detached from the eastern front to deal with the situation.⁴ Consequently, 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu changed sides again, and renewed his pact with Bil-Qīsh. They were joined by Midbuḥ in mid-January and by most of the rest of the Gaznaya. But Bil-Qīsh was wary of committing himself too far, for he remembered how 'Amar bin Ḥamīdu had betrayed him.⁵

Bil-Qīsh was justified in his caution, for bin 'Abd al-Karīm made immediate moves to crush the rebellion. His forces in the Marnīsa arrested a large number of Marnīsīs.

¹ Ibid., Ḥāmid Mukhtār, 17 Dec. 1923, and Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Qādir al-Faḥsī, 26 Dec. 1923.

² See above, p. 78.

³ SHM Melilla Leg. 23, Información Diciembre, Sidi Idrīs al-Bashīr, 15 Dec. 1923.

⁴ SHM Melilla Leg. 24, Informaciones, Ḥaddu b. al-Ḥājj Ḥāmid, 1 Jan. 1924, and Resumen General, 16 Jan. 1924.

⁵ Ibid., Resumen General, 17 Jan. 1924, and Información del Día, 18 Jan. 1924, and Muḥammad b. al-Ḥājj 'Alī Agharbī, 22 Jan. 1924, and Resumen General, 23 Jan. 1924.

and Warghīs.¹ These joined a large number of people who had been imprisoned on 'Amar bin Ḥamīdu's request at the beginning of January, a graphic illustration of how the Marnīsi gā'id had changes sides.²

Bin 'Abd al-Karīm took considerable numbers of troops from the eastern front to deal with the situation, a price of 15,000 pesetas was put on 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu's head,³ and by promising to release all the shaykhs that he held prisoner from the Banū Tūzīn, he succeeded in persuading that tribe to send contingents against 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu as well.⁴ Under this pressure Bil-Qīsh collapsed, and made his peace with bin 'Abd al-Karīm on 26 or 27 January.⁵ At the end of the month, the Rīfī leader sent another 700 men after 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu, despite an attempt by 'Abd al-Salām b. al-Ḥājj Muḥand to start yet another rebellion against him. Bin 'Abd al-Karīm was now reported to have massive forces in the Banū 'Amārt, ready to move into the Marnīsa--one estimate put it as high as 8,000 which was doubtless an exaggeration.⁶ But these were pursuit parties, for 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu was already beaten, and fled to the French zone on 28 January.⁷ There could have been no clearer demonstration of how bin 'Abd al-Karīm's power had grown. In 1922, he had been defeated

¹ Ibid., Resumen General, 17 Jan. 1924, and Muḥand Qaddur Tahar, 21 Jan. 1924.

² MAEF, Maroc. 519, pp. 139-140, prisoners nos. 79-96.

³ SHM Melilla Leg. 24, Informaciones, Muḥammad b. al-Ḥājj al-Muqaddam, 22 Jan. 1924, and Resumen General, 23 Jan. 1924, and Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Qādir al-Faḥsī, 24 Jan. 1924.

⁴ Ibid., Resumen General, 24 Jan. 1924, and Resumen General, 25 Jan. 1924.

⁵ Ibid., Resument General, 27 Jan. 1924.

⁶ Ibid., 'Amar b. Ṣadīq, 30 Jan. 1924, and Muḥammad b. al-Ḥājj 'Alī Agharbī, 30 Jan. 1924.

⁷ SHM Melilla Leg. 24, Información Febrero, Ampliación al Resumen General, 6 Feb. 1924.

by 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu. Now he could expel him from the Rif.

The mopping-up operations were severe, and gave Bil-Qīsh, who joined in, the opportunity to revenge himself on 'Amar bin Ḥamīdu's previous treachery. With the help of Muḥammad b. Ṭayyib of the Banū 'Amārt --who also bore 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu no friendship, having been imprisoned by him and 'Abd al-Mālik in the past¹--and Akhiṭṭu and Bū Raḥayl of the Maṭālsa, the houses of 'Amar bin Ḥamīdu's supporters were burned, 85 Marnīsīs were taken prisoner, and heavy fines were imposed.² On 10 February, bin 'Abd al-Karīm felt able, quite without foundation, to declare 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu dead.³

On 18 January, the people of Burid, in Bil-Qīsh's own clan of Banū 'Assim, petitioned bin 'Abd al-Karīm to accept one of their number--but not Bil-Qīsh--as "intermediary between us and the Makhzan", and this was accepted by bin 'Abd al-Karīm,⁴ and immediately after the flight of 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu, new officials were appointed in the Wargha --for instance, Muḥammad b. 'Amar al-'Amarānī was named as amīn al-umanā': by the maḥakma of al-Mazimma.⁵

With these appointments, the whole area came under Rifī control and the troops were moved back to the eastern front. In the Tafarsit sector, the Spanish estimated there

¹ See above, pp. 481, 610.

² SHM Melilla Leg. 124, Información Febrero, Resumen General, 7 Feb. 1924, and Resumen General, 9 Feb. 1924, and Resumen General, 12 Feb. 1924.

³ Ibid., Resumen General, 10 Feb. 1924. In fact, he escaped to the Branīs and thence to Taza, where the French kept a close watch on him--ibid., Resumen General, 27 Feb. 1924.

⁴ MAEF, Maroc 519, p. 206, People of Burid to Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Karīm, 12 Rajab 1342/18 Feb. 1924, and p. 53, Jamā'a of Burid--bay'a of new qā'id, 12 Rajab 1342/18 Feb. 1924.

⁵ Ibid., p. 196, maḥakma of al-Mazimma, letter of appointment of Muḥammad b. 'Amar al-'Amarānī, 29 Jumāda II 1342/6 Feb. 1924.

were 1,300 men of different tribes and a small number from the Banū Waryaghāl "which has the function of controlling the others, making them obey any orders given by bin 'Abd al-Karīm, and imposing sanctions on any who do not carry them out."¹ Once again, by relying on the strength of the Banū Waryaghāl, bin 'Abd al-Karīm was in complete control and he could turn his attention to the Banū Zarwāl.

The Second Attack on the Banū Zarwāl

Towards the end of March, there was renewed fighting between pro-Rifī forces and the Banū Wanjil and Matīwa al-Jabal tribes of the Upper Wargha, who, supported by 'Abd al-Rahmān al-Darqāwī in the Banū Zarwāl, were refusing to supply men for the ḥarkas. Bū Laḥya was dealing with the Marnīsa at the same time for precisely the same reason.²

The Banū Zarwāl were too disruptive to Rifī political influence to be ignored. At the beginning of April, Tuhāmī al-Wazzānī of the Banū Khālīd, one of bin 'Abd al-Karīm's main supporters in the Ghumāra, was sent to the Banū Zarwāl to make propaganda for the Rifīs.³ Towards the end of the month, a ḥarka was organised in Targīst under the leadership of Muḥammad 'Aqqūh of the Banū Gamīl and Muḥammad Kūyas of Zargāt, with instructions to go to the Banū Zarwāl to "force them to join their Muslim brothers in defence of the Rif."⁴ The immediate reason for this attack was that

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 24, Información Marzo, Resumen General, 12 March 1924.

² Ibid., Resumen General, 23 Mar. 1924, and Resumen General, 24 Mar. 1924.

³ Skīraj, op. cit., p. 124, and SHM Ceuta Leg. 23, Información Oficina Central, Abril 1924, nota, 6 Apr. 1924.

⁴ SHM Melilla Leg. 24, Información Abril, Resumen General, 22 April 1924.

'Abd al-Raḥmān had killed another Zarwālī, one Wuld al-Murābiṭ Ḥāmid, whom bin 'Abd al-Karīm had appointed qā'id of the tribe.¹ Making its way through the Taghzūt tribe, between the Banū Aḥmad and Kitāma tribes of the Sinhāja Srair, the forces of the Rīfīs met those of 'Abd al-Raḥmān at the end of April. In this first encounter, the Rīfīs lost 16 dead and 'Abd al-Raḥmān only 7, so more Rīfī troops were sent led by Muḥammad Buḥūt and Bū Laḥya, but the Rīfī ḥarka continued to come off the worst in the fighting.²

After about a week the fighting stopped, while attempts were made to find some grounds for an agreement with 'Abd al-Raḥmān. Kūyas went on alone into the Banū Zarwāl in an effort to contact him. He left the ḥarka without appointing a temporary commander, and while he was away, 'Abd al-Raḥmān ordered his forces to attack the ḥarka. Fighting started again on 20 May, and, on Bū Drā's instructions, transmitted by telephone from Ajdīr, 'Aqqūh took over command of the ḥarka and withdrew it to the border between the Matīwa al-Jabal and Banū Zarwāl. Meanwhile, 'Abd al-Raḥmān moved into the Mazzyat tribe³ (to the south of the Matīwa al-Jabal), which had, perhaps unwillingly, joined the Rīfīs in November 1923. Bin 'Abd al-Karīm also ordered that Kuyas be arrested but he fled back to his tribe, the Zarqāt, and started a rebellion there.⁴

¹ Ibid., Resumen General, 24 April 1924.

² SHM Melilla Leg. 25, Informaciones Mayo, Resumen General, 2 May 1924, and Resumen General, 3 May 1924, and Resumen General, 4 May 1924, and Resumen General, 5 May 1924.

³ Ibid., Resumen General, 9 May 1924, and Resumen General 18 May 1924, and Resumen General, 19 May 1924, and Resumen General, 29 May 1924, and Resumen General, 22 May 1924, and Skīraj, op. cit., p. 125.

⁴ Ibid.

'Abd al-Raḥmān was now posing a serious threat to the security of the Rīfī state. He had strong support in the Banū Siddat, Zarqāt and even the Banū Mazdūī and Banū 'Amārt tribes on the borders of the Banū Waryaghāl, based largely on his religious prestige.¹ Potentially even more serious was his growing alliance with the Bujdayn family, sharīfs of the Nāsiriya ṭarīqa in the Banū Tūzīn.² This family had in the past been a centre of pro-French propaganda in their tribe.³ On 22 May 1924, one of Sī Aḥmad's sons was reported to be accompanying 'Abd al-Raḥmān in his struggle against bin 'Abd al-Karīm. The Rīfī leader was apparently furious with the two sharīfs, who were attacking him in their propaganda on the grounds of his lack of religious prestige.⁴ This alliance laid the ground for bin 'Abd al-Karīm's attacks on the religious orders because the resistance of 'Abd al-Raḥmān had sparked off, or incorporated, a general rebellion among the Ghumāra tribes, who used the opportunity to attack the Rīfī forces in their lands.

Rebellion in the Ghumāra

After control of the countryside in the Ghumāra had been secured by the Rīfīs, earlier in 1923, the area remained relatively quiet for some time. Individual Spanish positions were from time to time besieged--for instance, 200 men from the Banū Silmān surrounded the position at Taza, south-east

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 25, Informaciones Mayo, Resumen General, 23 May 1924.

² Drague, op. cit., p. 206.

³ See above, pp. 217, 236.

⁴ SHM Melilla Leg. 25, Información Confidentes, Sharīf al-Ḥājj al-Fāḍil b. Muḥammad al-Nāsirī, 22 May 1924. It is ironic that this particular informant should himself be a Nāsirī sharīf.

of Tighīsas, in mid-October 1923¹--but the succeeding months were spent mainly in strengthening Rīfī authority in the area. The remaining tribes to the east, in the Sinhāja Srair, which had not fully submitted to the Rīfīs yet, were incorporated into the state. The qā'id of the tiny tribe of Taghzūt, Sī Aḥmad b. Sa'id, received a letter from the Ghumāra announcing the imminent arrival of Rīfī forces at the beginning of October.² Taghzūt lay on the way to the Matīwa al-Jabal and the Banū Zarwāl, and would be used as the line of approach for the attack in March 1924,³ so its strategic importance was obvious.

In mid-October 1923, the Spanish authorities banned all commerce with the Ghumāra through the coastal positions but this only made the Ghumārīs dislike the Spanish even more and did not prevent cheap food from being smuggled in from Shāwin through the Akhmās.⁴ In any case, the Rīfīs had already banned commerce with the Spanish themselves--presumably in the hope of hindering Spanish intelligence-gathering and political work. On 10 October, the market at Amṭār was deserted, a fact which worried the Spanish considerably for it showed the extent of Rīfī control.⁵

At the end of September or beginning of October, the Spanish began to receive a series of complaints about the way in which the Rīfīs were behaving in the Ghumāra. There was forced conscription; for example, one qā'id recently.

¹ SHM Ceuta Leg. 20, Información Central Octubre de 1923, nota, 14 Oct. 1923.

² Ibid., nota, 5 Oct. 1923.

³ See above, p. 660.

⁴ SHM Ceuta Leg. 20, Información Central Octubre de 1923, nota, 14 October 1923.

⁵ Ibid., nota, 10 October 1923.

back from a visit to the Rīf, announced that he wanted half of all the men to join the ḥarka; and there was a heavy burden of taxation.¹

Things got worse for the Ghumārīs, not better. Sīdī Muḥand b. Qaddur, whom the new authorities wished to arrest, escaped to the "mountains" in the face of an expedition sent from the Rīfī headquarters at Tandamān to take him. Finding no one at his house, it was destroyed, along with his property. At the same time a tax of 15 pesetas was imposed on each house.² People were forced to submit to Rīfī authority because:

"The whole Ghumāra is like this, we have no . . . power, no news or information, no leaders of prestige or experience. No goods come in or out, buying and selling has been cut; and we have already told you of the lack of salt and so on . . ."³

In January 1924 another collection of taxes was imposed. After the 15 pesetas a house levied in December, a tax of one mudd of barley was collected from each house, in order to buy food for Akhrīrū's forces.⁴ Nothing much could be done about this situation, however, for the Rīfīs held many of the commanding positions. Each post was manned, on average, by 25 Rīfī regulars and these forces were reinforced with local levies. Thus the Ghumārīs had no hope of receiving any help because the Spanish were incapable, and al-Raisūlī was even more distasteful to them.⁵ It will be

¹ SHM Ceuta Leg. 21, Bajalato del Gomara, Muḥammad Badr al-Dīn al-Mimūn to 'Alī b. Sulaymān, Ṣafar 1342/Sept.-Oct. 1923.

² Ibid., Sīdī Muḥammad b. al-Ḥāshim al-Mimūnī to 'Alī b. Sulaymān, 5 Jumāda I 1342/14 Dec. 1923.

³ Ibid., Ḥammādī Mushbal to 'Alī b. Sulaymān, 5 Jumāda I 1342/14 Dec. 1923.

⁴ Ibid., Khalifa of Banū Bū Zrā to Castro Girona, 14 Jan. 1924.

⁵ Ibid.

remembered that there were discussions at this stage over the possibility of al-Raisūlī becoming khalīfa--but the very suggestion inspired opposition to the Spanish to an even greater extent.¹

By the first week of February the economic situation in the Ghumāra had grown even worse. One of the Spanish agents in the area suggested that the Spanish should take advantage of this and bring the area to a state of starvation by preventing any foodstuffs from being moved out of Shāwin, completing the blockade.² As it was, the Rifīs were still stronger and were clearly intent on staying permanently in the Ghumāra. The telephone line from Banū Bū Frāḥ was being extended along the coast. On 8 February, it had reached a point near Amṭār in the Banū Garīr. Nearby, at Targhāssa, Sa'īd Wuld Sī al-'Abīd Afailāl, the owner of a mill, was obliged to grind 70 mudds of barley each night to make bread for the troops. The Rifīs further announced that they wanted a command post next to the former house of 'Alī bin Sulaymān, and one near Galdat. Interestingly, these command posts were referred to as fisīna,³ an Arabisation of the Spanish oficina, a vivid reminder of how, in the eyes of the Ghumārīs, the nature of Rifī occupation was very similar to that of the Spanish.

By the end of February, houses were being built for Rifī troops in the Banū Zīyyat, Banū Silmān and Banū Bū Zrā.⁴

¹ Ibid., Khalīfa of Banū Bū Zrā to Castro Girona, 1 Rajab 1342/7 Feb. 1924.

² Ibid.

³ Ibid., Khalīfa of Banū Bū Zrā to Castro Girona, 2 Rajab 1342/8 Feb. 1924.

⁴ Ibid., Muḥammad Badr al-Dīn b. Mimūn to 'Alī b. Sulaymān, 17 Rabaj 1342/23 Feb. 1924.

At the beginning of March, groups assembled at Tigīsas, Amṭār, Qā' Assrās, and Tīrinās with the intention of occupying the Banū Sijjil and Akhmās as part of a general attack on the Spanish positions. Akhrīrū, who had large forces near Amṭār, composed of his own band and men from the Banū Manṣūr, Banū Razīn, Banū Samīḥ, Matīwa al-Baḥar, and Banū Khālīd, was supposed to attack Amṭār, Tighīsas, and Magān, and then move on to Tetuan (see Map XI: 2). On 4 or 5 March, Sī Maḥammad brought 200 Rīfīs for the attacks on Amṭār and Tighīsas; a few days later, two more cannon were sent from the Rīf into the Ghumāra, and 200 more men from the Banū Gamīl arrived at Amṭār. By 10 March, the Spanish estimated that there were 2,000 men mobilised on the Ghumāra front.¹

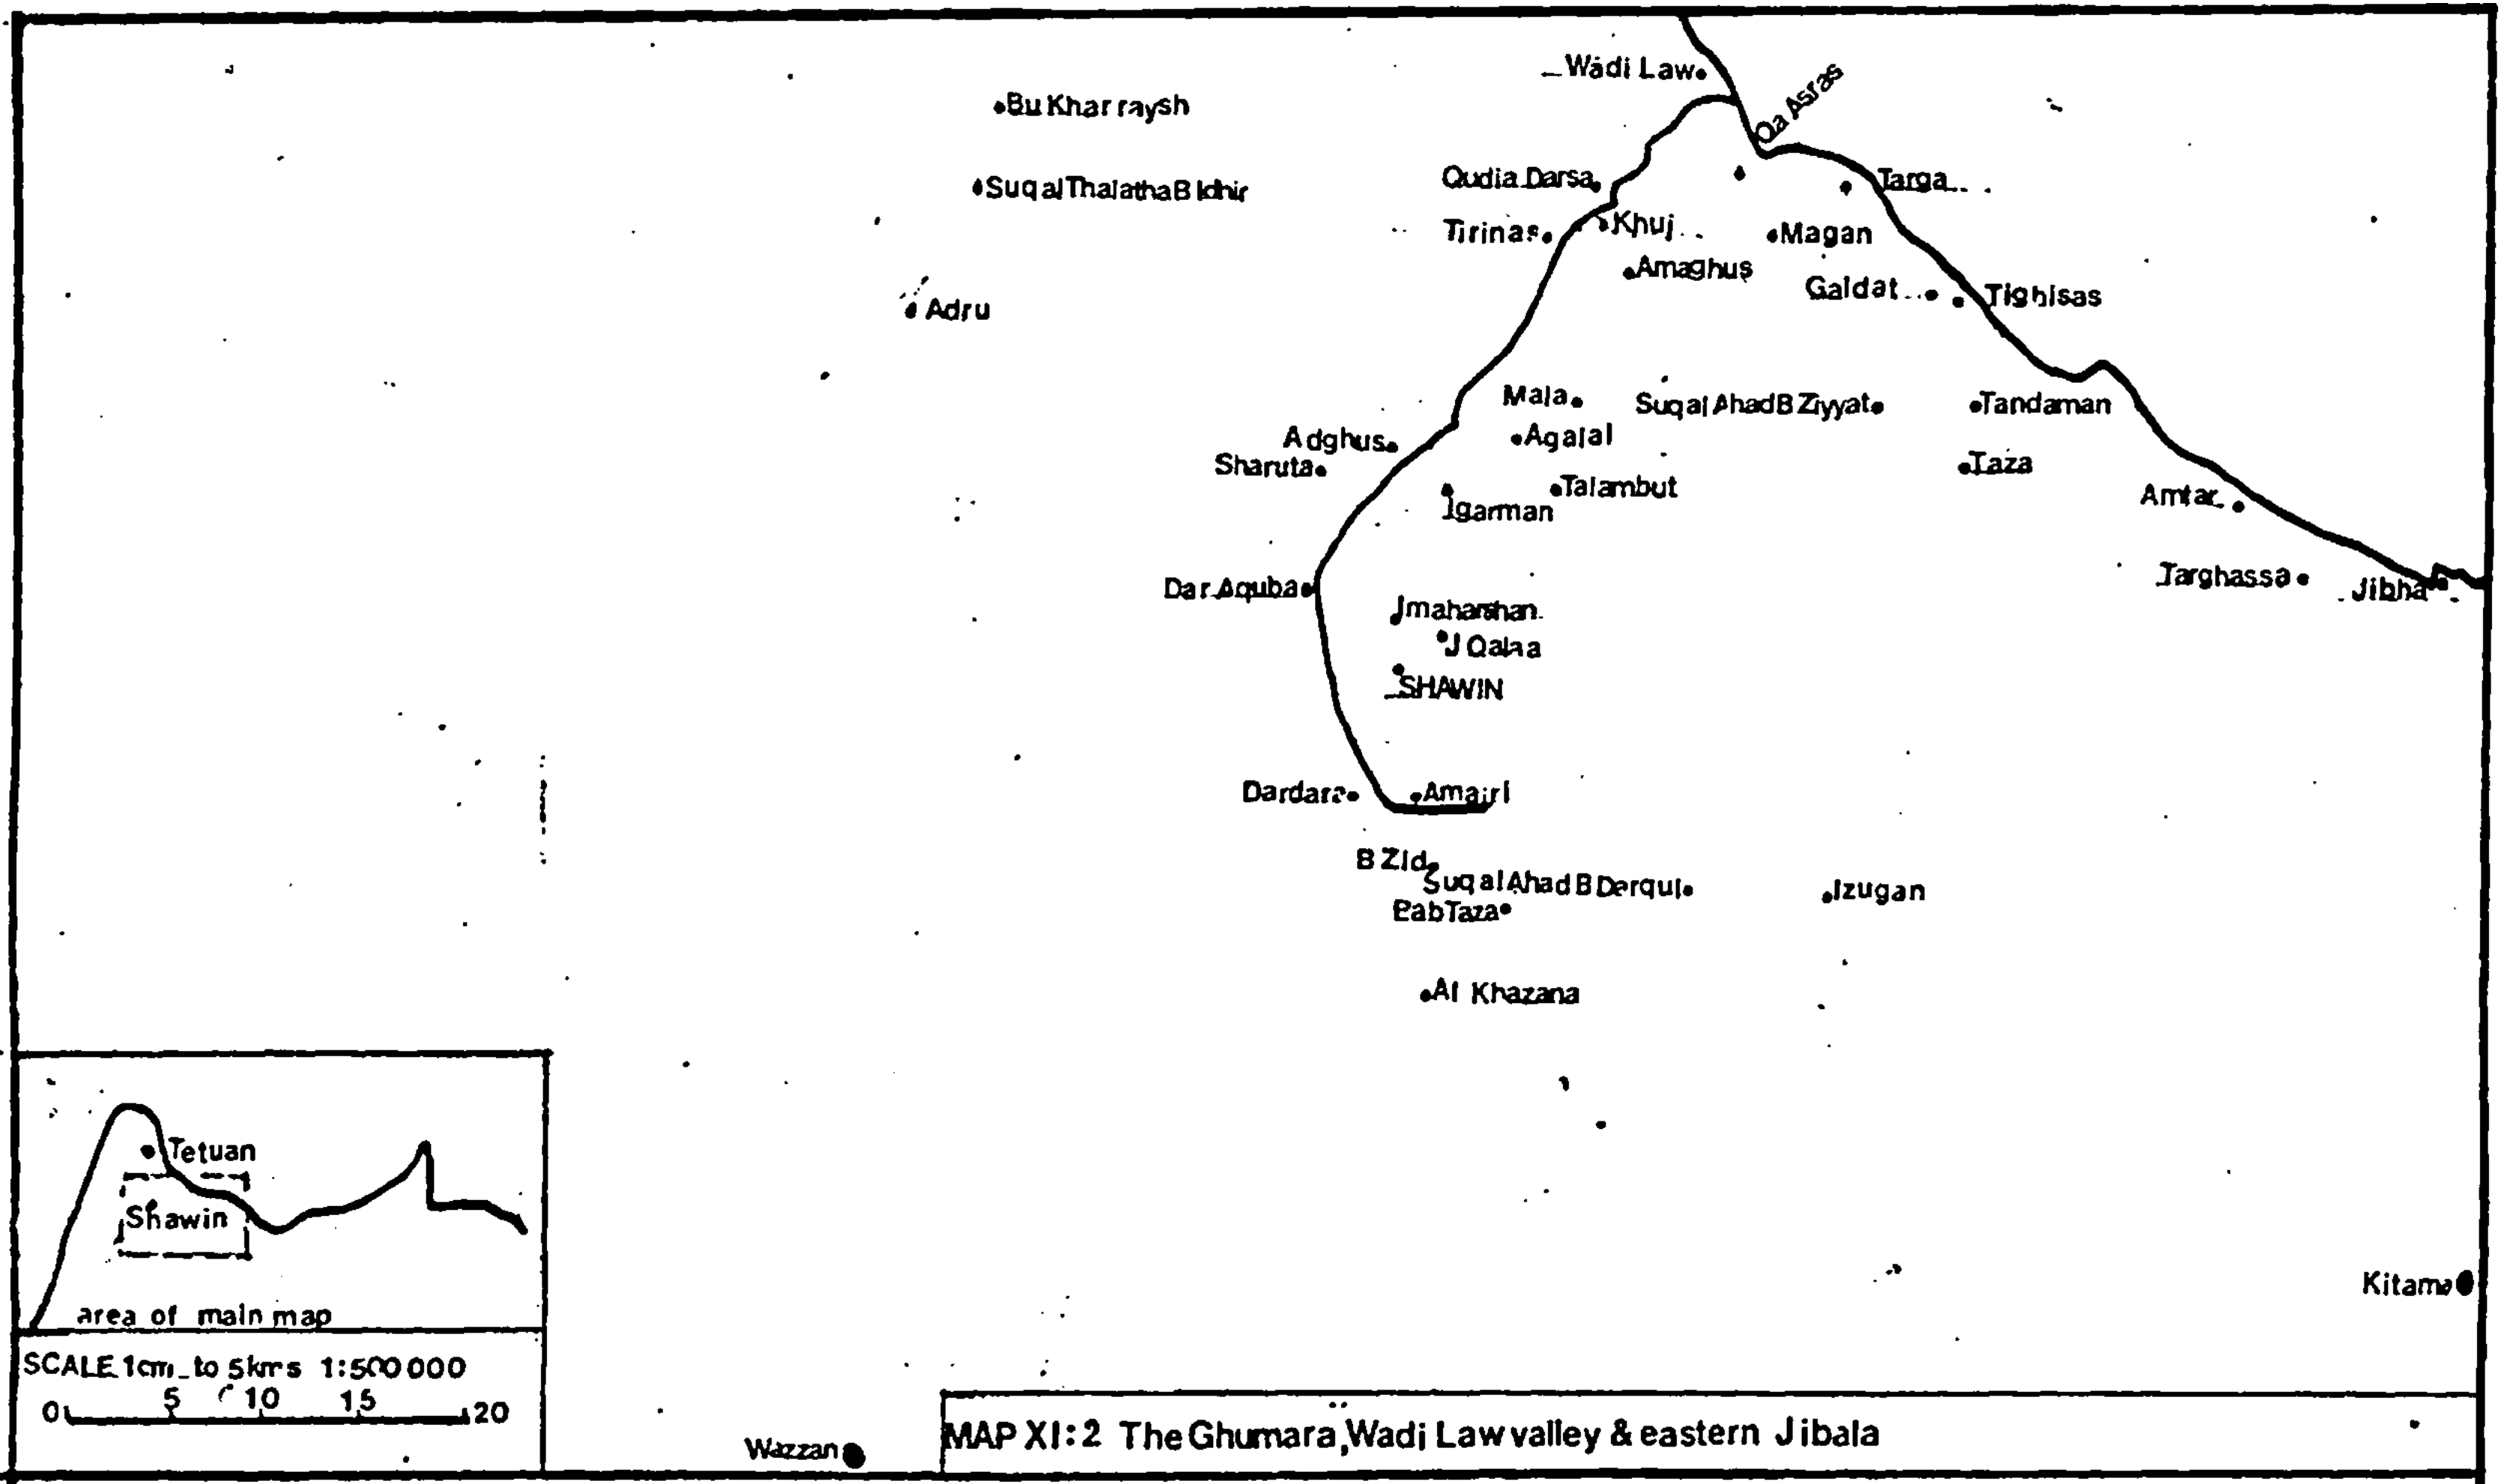

Yet, despite heavy fighting at Amṭār on 11 March,² the general offensive never materialised. There are two reasons. Firstly, bin 'Abd al-Karīm wanted to concentrate on defeating 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu's revolt, and secondly there was a minor revolt in the Ghumāra itself.

The Ghumāra, as has been shown, was deeply upset by the heavy taxation and demands for troops. Prices had also reached new heights. In parts of the Ghumāra, people were paying one peseta for one of the tiny cups used for drinking tea, filled with salt.³ Some of the tribes took the opportunity offered by 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu's revolt to rise as well --the eastern Ghumāra tribes of the Matīwa al-Baḥar, Banū :

¹ SHM Ceuta Leg. 23, Información Oficina Central Marzo de 1924, nota, 2 Mar. 1924, and nota 5 Mar. 1924, and nota, 8 Mar. 1924, and nota, 9 Mar. 1924, and nota, 10 Mar. 1924, and Skīraj, op. cit., p. 123.

² SHM Ceuta Leg. 23, Información Oficina Central Marzo de 1924, nota, 11 Mar. 1924.

³ Ibid., nota, 7 Mar. 1924.

Razīn, Banū Samīḥ, Banū Garīr, and Banū Manṣūr started to fight the Rīfīs. But the western Ghumāra remained loyal and the rebellion died down.¹

But food remained scarce in the Ghumāra, and at the end of March the Spanish army in Morocco was hopeful that it would soon be able to invade the Ghumāra, for the defenders had no salt or barley, and cartridges were expensive.² This really was misplaced optimism, because no matter how weak the Ghumārīs were from hunger, Primo de Rivera was unlikely to grant permission for such an operation. Nevertheless, bin 'Abd al-Karīm took precautions. He made sure that his positions facing the Spanish were well manned--on 21 April there were reported to be 1,400 at Tighīsas and 300 at Amṭār, and on 9 May, 825 at Talambūṭ.³

Also, a plan was announced in mid-April to disarm the Ghumārīs--except those in the ḥarkas, of course. At the beginning of May, al-Ḥattāsh was sent from the Rīf to carry out this policy.⁴ This was not a new idea--bin 'Abd al-Karīm had talked about doing the same thing in the Rīf--but it infuriated even his supporters in the Ghumāra. Wuld Tuhāmī : al-Wazzānī, the pro-Rīfī qā'id in the Banū Khālid, immediately disbanded his ḥarka and went home, giving as a reason, as though one were needed, that he was worried about the threat from the Banū Zarwāl, where fighting between the

¹ Ibid., nota, 19-Mar. 1924.

² Ibid., nota, 26 Mar. 1924, and nota, 30 Mar. 1924.

³ SHM Ceuta Leg. 23, Información Oficina Central Abril 1924, nota, 21 Apr. 1924, and SHM Ceuta Leg. 23, Información Oficina Central Mayo 1924, nota, 9 May 1924.

⁴ SHM Ceuta Leg. 23, Información Oficina Central Abril 1924, nota, 1y Apr. 1924, and SHM Ceuta Leg. 23, Información Oficina Central Mayo 1924, nota, 10 May 1924.

forces of 'Abd al-Rahmān and the Rifis was now in earnest.¹

Indeed, the fighting in the Banū Zarwāl gave new hopes to the Ghumārī dissidents, particularly after Kūyas rebelled against bin 'Abd al-Karīm. A meeting was held at Jibḥa, attended by people from the Banū Garīr, Banū Khālid, Zarqāt, Banū Gamīl and parts of the Banū Razīn and Matīwa al-Baḥar, presided over by Sī al-Ḥassan b. Sāliḥ, a sharīf from the Banū Razīn. The rebels appointed Kūyas as their military leader and decided to start by attacks on Targīst and to cut the telephone lines between Targīst and Thalāthā' Kitāma, and between Jibḥa and Tighīsas (where they had reached in April).² It seems quite likely that at this stage, the rebels did not "represent" their tribes as such, for the different tribes rose one by one, and at different times, during the following days, as the dissident leaders returned home.

On 13 or 14 May, telephone lines between the Rif and Ghumāra were cut.³ Those responsible then proceeded to mock this particular symbol of Rifī power. They took a sizeable length of the severed wire and tried to shout down it to someone "listening" at the other end. Not surprisingly, he could hear nothing, whereupon they announced that bin 'Abd al-Karīm was lying and that the telephone lines were a trick. Others said that telephone lines were unnatural, the work of Satan, and should be destroyed. This sort of behaviour can be explained, as al-Bū 'Ayyāshī does, as "foolishness or a pretence at foolishness,"¹ but the telephone lines, primitive though the system might be, were a physical symbol of the technological and organisational superiority of the Rifis, and of their political authority. It is not surprising that their opponents in the Ghumāra hated the telephone wires, and took great pleasure in destroying them--quite apart from the tactical necessity of doing so in order to isolate the Rifis in the west from Ajdir.

¹ SHM Ceuta Leg. 23, Información Oficina Central Mayo 1924, nota, 10 May 1924, and nota, 11 May 1924, and nota 14 May 1924.

² Skīraj, op. cit., pp. 125-126.

³ SHM Ceuta Leg. 23, Información Oficina Central Mayo 1924, nota, 14 May 1924.

Once again, it was the eastern Rifis who had risen first--the Matīwa al-Baḥar, Banū Razīn and Banū Samīḥ. They attacked the ḥarka besieging Amṭār, and Sha'ib b. al-Falāḥ² was obliged to bring forces of the regular army from Tigīsas to oppose them, reducing the numbers on that front. On 15 May, 30 Rifis were killed,³ and Rifi forces in the western Ghumāra were cut off from support from the Rif by the rising in the eastern Ghumāra, although the Banū Zīyyāt, Banū Bū Zrā and Banū Silmān remained loyal to the Rifis.⁴ Akhrīrū was cut off in the Banū Sijjil.⁵ The rebels nearly caught Bū Laḥya as well, who was in the Kitāma tribe on his way to the Banū Zarwāl. When he found he could not get through because of the rebellion, he returned as quickly as possible to Targīst, hotly pursued by rebels who tried to capture him. They also failed to capture the Rifi pasha of the Banū Khālid, and Qā'id Aḥmad b. 'Amar al-Buqquyī, an important Rifi military leader in the tribe. The failure to take important

¹ Al-Bū 'Ayyāshī, op. cit., Vol. II, p. 203.

² Ibid., and SHM Ceuta Leg. 23, Información Oficina Central Mayo 1924, nota, 16 May 1924.

³ Sha'ib b. al-Falāḥ commanded one of the ṭabūrs of the Rifi regular army (Hart, Aith Waryaghar, p. 386).

⁴ SHM Ceuta Leg. 23, Información Oficina Central Mayo 1924, nota, 22 May 1924.

⁵ Ibid., nota, 21 May 1924.

leaders caused the downfall of the rebels, for when Bū Laḥya got back to Ajdīr he brought back the first certain news of the rebellion. Preparations were at once made to crush it. Bū Drā went to the eastern front, to Akhshāb Amghār to ensure that rebellion did not spread there, where it might have been fanned by the Bujdayn family, and Azarqān set off by car for the maḥakma of Banū Bū Frāḥ accompanied by two Waryaghli qā'ids, 'Amar b. 'Allūsh and 'Abd al-Hādī b. 'Azzūz, and followed by 50 men from bin 'Abd al-Karīm's own bodyguard. At Banū Bū Frāḥ he met Sī Maḥammad, who had returned there from Targīst, on his brother's instructions, again transmitted by telephone.¹

Meanwhile, the tribes of Targīst, Banū Mazdūī, Zarqāt and Banū Gamīl had risen, around 23 or 24 May, taking the rebellion even closer to the Rīf itself, and making common cause with the Wargha tribes which had risen in alliance with 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Darqāwī.² The rising in the Targīst and Zarqāt is partly explained by the activities of Kuyas, and partly by those of Sī Maḥammad b. 'Alī "Sliṭṭayn", a nephew of the leader of the Awlād Akhamlīsh, Sī Muḥammad b. Ṣadiq (who remained loyal to the Rīfīs). "Sliṭṭayn" had been present at the Jibḥa meeting, and now he was joined by his younger brother 'Alī, who was only 19 years old.³ On

¹ Skīraj, op. cit., pp. 126-127.

² SHM Ceuta Leg. 23, Informacion Oficina Central Mayo 1924, nota, 21 May 1924.

³ Skīraj, op. cit., p. 125, and "Maghzen Riffain", p. 14. Muḥammad b. 'Alī was about 31 years old at the time, and after the revolt was protected by his father, Sī 'Alī, until he received bin 'Abd al-Karīm's pardon. Nevertheless, during 1925 he started corresponding with the French. 'Alī, his younger brother, fled to Tangier in Dec. 1924, where he was received by Primo de Rivera. On the younger 'Alī's return to the Rīf, bin 'Abd al-Karīm imprisoned him until Muḥammad b. Ṣadiq, his uncle, obtained his release ("Maghzan Riffain", p. 14).

21 May, the inland part of the Banū Samīḥ joined the revolt, while the lowlands near the coast remained loyal to bin 'Abd al-Karīm.¹ But the Rīfīs had already started to put down the revolt. When Azarqān advanced into the Mastāsa, immediately west of the maḥakma at Banū Bū Frāḥ--repairing the telephone lines on the way--he arrested the qā'id of the tribe, and sent him back to Banū Bū Frāḥ as a prisoner. Fifty more men arrived to help him from the eastern front, and in one engagement the Sharīf al-Ḥassan b. Sāliḥ al-Razīnī was wounded and the main rebel force was split up. Kuyas fled to Fez, and 'Alī, the brother of Sliṭṭayn, was arrested. 'Abd al-Karīm b. 'Alī al-Ḥattāsh then wrote to Akhrīrū telling him to come to join them, and at Azarqān's request they proceeded to "punish" the rebels.²

The punishment was very harsh. On 26 or 27 May, Rīfī forces, led by al-Ḥattāsh and Akhrīrū, attacked the Banū Garīr and Banū Samīḥ. Houses in the territory of both tribes were burned.³ The Banū Garīr quickly made peace and sacrificed a bull to the Rīfīs, and Wuld Sī Tuhāmī, aware now that the Rīfīs would win, quickly joined them again. This change of heart, at the end of May, was quite possibly hastened by a group of 600 troops, some of them from the Rīfī regular army and some irregulars (mujāhidīn) led by al-Ḥattāsh, who after dealing with the Banū Samīḥ and Banū Garīr moved into the Banū Khālīd to attack a ḥarka led by a paternal cousin of 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Darqāwī, named 'Abd al-Karīm. Al-Ḥattāsh was joined by 200 more men from the

¹ SHM Ceuta Leg. 23, Información Oficina Central Mayo 1924, nota, 27 May 1924.

² Skīraj, op. cit., pp. 127-128.

³ Ibid., p. 128, and SHM Ceuta Leg. 23, Información Oficina Central Mayo 1924, nota, 27 May 1924.

Rif--again led by two Waryaghliis, 'Abd al-Hādī and 'Amar b. 'Allūsh--with instructions from bin 'Abd al-Karīm to deal with the Banū Khālīd and Banū Zarwāl harka very firmly indeed. 'Abd al-Raḥmān's cousin only just got back to the Banū Zarwāl in time to escape capture,¹ but for the moment Rīfī forces did not attempt to follow him into that tribe.

By 3 May the Rīfīs had regained control and those responsible--particularly the Banū Garīr--had been heavily punished. Any further opposition in the Banū Khālīd and Akhmās was allayed by a reported 250,000 pesetas sent by bin 'Abd al-Karīm to buy support in that quarter.²

Other tribes were dealt with even more severely. In the Banū Razīn, the houses and lands of the southern clan of Banū Qāsim near the Kitāma were burned out. Once the obedience of the Banū Khālīd had been secured, the borders of the Akhmās were attacked, and 20 villages in that tribe were burned.³

By the end of the first week in June, the rebellion had been completely crushed and the Rīfīs were back in force on the Wādī Lāw front; 100 Rīfīs arrived at Tandamān on 6 June.⁴ The action had been taken with considerable ferocity, and crops and houses were burned. But now, when all was quiet, bin 'Abd al-Karīm ordered that the telephone lines be repaired,⁵ and Sī Maḥammad himself arrived in Targhāssa with a reported 15,000 men.⁶

¹ Skīraj, op. cit., p. 128.

² SHM Ceuta Leg. 24, Información Oficina Central Junio 1924, nota, 3 June 1924.

³ Ibid., nota, 4 June 1924, and nota, 6 June 1924.

⁴ Ibid., nota, 6 June 1924, and nota, 8 June 1924.

⁵ Skīraj, op. cit., p. 129.

⁶ Al-Bū 'Ayyāshī, op. cit., Vol. II, p. 204.

The continued threat from 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Darqāwī in the Banū Zarwāl was also removed for the moment. On 5 June a truce was arranged between him and b. 'Abd al-Karīm, and on 12 June the Rīfī troops began to withdraw from the Banū Zarwāl.¹

The rebellion was the last effective challenge to bin 'Abd al-Karīm's power in the Ghumāra. It had expressed fury over taxation, the lack of food and the disruption caused by the Rīfī presence, and had been directed against the physical manifestations of the power--the telephone wires, for example. Furthermore, as specific evidence of the position of the Banū Waryaghal within the new state, the anger of the Ghumārīs had been particularly directed against that tribe. At the height of the fighting, the rebels had told the Buqquyī contingents in the Rīfī ḥarka that they could return home in peace, for their quarrel was with the Banū Waryaghal.² However, although they may have felt that the threat came from the Banū Waryaghal, bin 'Abd al-Karīm had enough allies in the area--and in particular the support of Akhrīrū--to ensure his final victory.

Conflict with the French

In October 1923, the French forces had entered the territory of the Banū Mazgilda. This worried the Banū Zarwāl and they wrote to the Spanish asking them to come into the tribe.³ In November 1923, the Mazziyat tribe in the northern

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 25, Información Junio, nota, 5 June 1924, and nota, 12 June 1924.

² SHM Ceuta Leg. 23, Información Oficina Central Mayo 1924, nota, 25 May 1924.

³ SHM Ceuta Leg. 19, Cartas Arabes, Qā'id Muḥammad al-Murābiṭ, Sayyid 'Abd al-Salām al-Zarbuh, and Shaykh al-Ḥassan of the jamā'a of Tazghadra and all their brothers who are with them, to Captain governing Shāwin, 10 Oct. 1923, and Muḥammad b.

Wargha valley, equally concerned about French advances, had written to the Spanish explaining that they had joined the Rifis because of those advances, but expressed a similar desire to work with the Spanish instead.¹ Clearly, further French advances in the Wargha area would eventually conflict with the Rifis' own expansionist plans. Not surprisingly, those most at risk, the unoccupied tribes in the French zone, bordering on the Rif, looked towards bin 'Abd al-Karīm for help. Bin 'Abd al-Karīm seems to have wanted to avoid any trouble with the French and tried to play down their offers to submit to him, and to ignore their appeals for help. Skīraj, who does not give a date (but from the context it would seem to have been in the late autumn of 1923), relates what happened when representatives of the Banū Aḥmad and the Mastāra tribes went to see bin 'Abd al-Karīm to offer him their bay'a. Bin 'Abd al-Karīm agreed to appoint qā'ids for the Banū Aḥmad, but told the Mastāra representatives:

"You are not included in this zone and at this time we have no desire to interfere in the affairs of the French zone in which you are included. For this reason we cannot appoint a qā'id over you at this time, although we greatly rejoice that you have come into the sphere of the Muslims who are vigilant in defence of the land of their brothers, and you will be well rewarded by God."²

Bin 'Abd al-Karīm's reluctance to become involved against the French is understandable because he would have wished to avoid a southern front as well, but other factors would inevitably force him to fight them.

In the past, the French had worked through 'Abd al-Ḥājj al-Zarwālī to Capt. Costello, governor of Shāwin, 27 Ṣafar 1342/9 Oct. 1923. See above, p. 625.

¹ Ibid., All the a'yān of Mazziyat to Governor of Shāwin, 11 Rabī' II 1342/20 Nov. 1923. See above,

² Skīraj, op. cit., pp. 122-123.

al-Raḥmān al-Darāwī in the Banū Zarwāl, and since this alliance put them objectively with him against bin 'Abd al-Karīm's expansion into the Wargha, that was another possible point of friction. Finally, the Rifis' success against the Spanish and the subsequent declaration of an independent Muslim state in the Rif, made it a rallying-point for tribes in the French zone who were still fighting the French but who had no territorial link with the Rif at all. So, on 11 April 1924, the leaders of the Banū Warrayn confederacy in the northern part of the Middle Atlas, south of Tāza--the famous "Tache de Taza"--wrote to bin 'Abd al-Karīm. They described him as:

" . . . the man whose ancestry is good and pure, going back to the Caliph [of the Prophet], God have mercy upon him and grant him peace, 'Umar al-Khaṭṭāb, may God be pleased with him . . . Sīdī . . . Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Karīm al-Rifī, the man who governs in the name of God, may He be exalted, God's peace crown all your works . . ." ¹

They announced that they had "emigrated in the cause of God" and that they wished to submit to bin 'Abd al-Karīm's orders, because his rule was founded on the principles of the sharī'a. ²

They they told him that the French had surrounded them in their mountains and they were suffering greatly from the cold and the attacks of the French aeroplanes. They only saw their wives and children at night, they said, because by day they were hidden:

"Indeed we are like an island in the middle of the sea . . . So have pity on our state because of our weakness before God, may He be exalted, and his Prophet,

¹ MAEF, Maroc 517, Maḥammad bin Muḥammad al-'Alāwī al-Warraynī al-Tijānī, Sīdī Raḥu, Sīdī 'Alī, Sha'ib b. Muḥand, and Aḥmad Tamast to Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Karīm, 6 Ramaḍān 1342/11 Apr. 1924.

² Ibid.

God have mercy upon him and give him peace. You must come to our country from your own with your armies or however it seems best to you. You know what must be done [to help] us."¹

With these three factors combined, it is clear that even if bin 'Abd al-Karīm himself felt no desire to invade the French zone, he would eventually be drawn into conflict with the French.

However, until now bin 'Abd al-Karīm had been generally believed to be in league with the French. 'Abd al-Mālik had used this against him, and in June 1924, purely for its propaganda value; 'Abd al-Raḥmād al-Darqāwī did the same. On 15 June, after the agreement with Bin 'Abd al-Karīm had been concluded and the Rīfī forces were withdrawn, 'Abd al-Raḥmān wrote to his opponent. He said that he would fight the French if they came to the Banū Zarwāl, just as he would fight the Spanish, for both were Christians. He could not, he said, understand why bin 'Abd al-Karīm was friendly towards the French.² The implication, of course, was that he was a better Muslim than bin 'Abd al-Karīm. Bin 'Abd al-Karīm was not particularly concerned about such allegations, and at a meeting of the a'yān and qā'ids of the Rīf and Sinhāja, held, after the conclusion of the temporary peace with 'Abd al-Raḥmān, at the Sunday market of Ruādī in the Buqquya, he told his audience that the whole rising had been organised by the murābiṭīn of the Darqāwīya order, and that those "traitors" were in league with the French, who were advancing into the Sinhāja. He also told them that he suspected that the French would attack the Rīf and that everyone must be ready to defend his country.³

¹ Ibid.

² SHM Melilla Leg. 25, Información Batil, nota, 15 June 1924.

³ Skiraj, op. cit., pp. 129-130.

On 16 June, presumably to give the lie to 'Abd al-Rahmān's insinuations, bin 'Abd al-Karīm wrote a letter to the French authorities in which he claimed they had betrayed him, and that as a result he would have to seek a peace with the Spanish. It was absolutely necessary for bin 'Abd al-Karīm to make this sort of propaganda, because when the French had occupied positions around 'Ain Midyuna at the beginning of June, the Rifis had not opposed them. Indeed, Rīfī representatives had met the French and negotiated with them. This had caused an extremely bad impression among the tribes bordering on the French zone, and people began to say that although he fought the Spanish, bin 'Abd al-Karīm helped the French to occupy the tribes.²

So, on his return to Ajdīr from Sūq al-Aḥad Ruādī, bin 'Abd al-Karīm called all his ministers and senior qā'ids together to discuss the problem of the French who were advancing through the Banū Mizzyat and Matīwa al-Jabal to the edge of the Banū Zarwāl, and so to the edge of the territory which bin 'Abd al-Karīm claimed for the Rif. On bin 'Abd al-Karīm's instructions, the Minister of War, Bū Drā, sent 500 men under 'Allūsh b. Ṣadiq al-Waryaghli to take up position on the border of the Sinhāja Srair and Matīwa al-Jabal, which were to be considered "the borders of the amīr's authority."³ These troops were to remain there and to guard the border, but were to take no further action, unless the French attacked them, despite a general feeling among the troops that they wanted to attack the French.⁴

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 25, Información Batil, nota, 16 June 1924.

² SHM Melilla Leg. 25, Información Junio, nota, 6 June 1924.

³ Skiraj, op. cit., pp. 180-181.

⁴ Ibid., p. 181.

Thus bin 'Abd al-Karīm tried to limit his action against the French.

However, for a short time, bin 'Abd al-Karīm forbade any dealings with the French,¹ and some of his supporters actually engaged the French in battle. In operations in the Sinhja Ghaddu and Banū Wanjil tribes in mid-June, 13 men from Miḍār were wounded.² When the French advanced into the southern part of the Marnīsa on 20 June, the Rīfī ḥarka joined the Marnīsīs and Gaznayīs in the resistance.³ However, hostilities ceased when the French advance stopped, and commercial relations between the French zone and the Rīf reopened.⁴

Nevertheless, the Rīfīs had acquitted themselves well against the French. Fighting alongside local people, they had stopped the French advance and forced it back, winning for themselves some useful booty in the process. There were supplies of ammunition and some guns, and some livestock was also captured--or expropriated. Bū Raḥayl returned home with 25 cows. 700 Rīfīs who remained on the French front, mainly in the Banū Walīd and Matīwa al-Jabal,⁵ were forbidden to undertake any further action against the French, since bin 'Abd al-Karīm was concerned to keep the commercial routes to the French zone open.⁶ However, at the end of July, the French complained that Rīfī forces had twice

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 25, Información Junio, nota, 15 June 1924, and nota, 29 June 1924.

² Ibid., nota, 15 June 1924, and nota, 18 June 1924.

³ Ibid., nota, 21 June 1924.

⁴ Ibid., nota, 29 June 1924.

⁵ SHM Melilla Leg. 25, Información Batil, 'Abd al-Salām al-Fannāssī, 1 July 1924.

⁶ SHM Melilla Leg. 25, Información Julio, nota, 9 July 1924.

attacked them in strength in the upper valley of the Wargha. On 25 July, they said, an organised raid involving 1,200 Rifis was driven off their newly occupied positions.¹ These attacks continued into August. On 7 August, groups of Rifis were reported to be fighting the French in the Hawara area between Taza and Garsif.²

Apparently what had happened was that Qā'id 'Allūsh b. Ṣadiq, who had been sent out to watch over the French frontier, had been asked by a group of the Hawara to come into their lands to help them against the French, in return for which they promised to give their bay'a to bin 'Abd al-Karīm. 'Allūsh, without consulting anyone, agreed and moved into the tribe, and as he did so wrote to Bū Drā to tell him what he was doing. Both Bū Drā and bin 'Abd al-Karīm were deeply concerned by what 'Allūsh was doing, and that his unauthorised invasion of the French zone would cause trouble, just at the point when things were going well in the Jibāla and Ghumāra. Therefore, they telephoned their orders for the Rifis to withdraw at once, and when this was done 'Allūsh was arrested.³

Sporadic hostilities continued for a while but bin 'Abd al-Karīm had more immediate concerns than the French, for the attack in the the Ghumāra and Jibāla was reaching its pitch. Idrīs b. Mimūn Khūjja was transferred to the Shāwin front⁴ and bin 'Abd al-Karīm forbade any further attacks on the French.⁵

¹ The Times, 1 Aug. 1924, p. 11, dated Tanjier, 31 July 1924.

² SHM Melilla Leg. 25, Información Agosto, nota, 7 Aug. 1924.

³ Skīraj, op. cit., pp. 136-137.

⁴ SHM Melilla Leg. 25, Información Batil, nota, 22 Sept. 1924.

⁵ Ibid., nota, 25 Sept. 1925.

The first attacks on the French were unplanned and, by bin 'Abd al-Karīm at least, seemingly undesired. However, the underlying strains remained and would reappear: rivalry over the control of the Upper Wargha, and the interests of the tribes in the French zone, who were still fighting. For the moment, however, the Rifis had more concern for the Ghumāra and Jibāla.

The Spanish Withdraw

In July 1924, Primo de Rivera made it clear that he wanted to pull back the Spanish forces in the Jibāla and Ghumāra to secure lines of defence. However, he issued no time-table for the withdrawal.

In fact, the timing of the withdrawal was dictated by events, for at the beginning of July 1924 the Rifis began a major offensive in the Ghumāra. Events turned out very much as Primo de Rivera had foreseen and the Rifis attacked in turn each of the isolated Spanish blockhouses scattered along the Ghumāra coast and up the Wādī Lāw valley. After the Ajdīr conference in which the problem of the French had been discussed, Sī Maḥammad had gone to Targa to join the army commanded by al-Ḥattāsh and other Waryaghli and Buqquyī leaders, along with a few Ghumārīs, including Sī Muḥammad Muḥrūsh of the Banū Silmān, and the important Sharīf Sī al-Makkī al-Wazzānī, of the zawiya of Bū Aḥmad near Tighīsas, who later became the Rifi Pasha of the Ghumāra. Sī Maḥammad told them to begin the attacks on Spanish positions, under the overall command of Azarqān.¹

On 1 July, Spanish Military Intelligence reported that a ḥarka of 800 men was being prepared in the Rif, to join in the attack on communications between Tetuan and Shāwin.¹

¹ Skīraj, op. cit., pp. 131-132.

Azarqān's plan was to attack all positions between Talambūṭ and al-Qubā' Darsa--Skīraj says there were about 18 of them--and at the same time Akhrīrū was sent with 200 men to the Banū Ḥassan to attack the road from Tetuan to Shāwin, al-Ḥattāsh and Sī al-Makkī al-Wazzānī were sent to attack the coastal positions near Wādī Lāw, 700 men (200 of them from the regular army) to Adghūs, and the same number to attack positions between Wādī Lāw and Talambūṭ.² Clearly the Rifis had large numbers of troops available (see Map XI: 2 above, p. 666).

The attack began on 27 June. The first posts to be besieged were at Khūj and al-Qubā' Darsa in the Wādī Lāw valley. They were cut off for several days before they were relieved on 6 July.³

Although the Rifis' military activity quietened down once these two garrisons were relieved, the two Spanish columns which had been sent into the Wādī Lāw valley, one from each end, did not finally meet until 23 July,⁴ and there were isolated attacks on other Spanish positions, for instance, on the Tetuan to Shāwin road at Sūq al-Arbā'a of the Banū Ḥassan on 26 July.⁵

The semi-calm gave time for the Rifis to group

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 25, Información Julio, nota, 1 July 1924.

² Skīraj, op. cit., pp. 132-133.

³ Fleming, op. cit., p. 172 and The Times, 8 July, p. 13, dated Madrid, 7 July 1924, and 9 July, p. 24, dated Madrid, 8 July 1924.

⁴ Ibid., 25 July 1924, p. 13.

⁵ Ibid., 29 July, p. 11, dated Tangier, 27 July 1924.

more forces locally and to move up others from the Rif to attack the Spanish. Al-Ḥattāsh ordered the Banū Manṣūr, Banū Silmān, Banū Khālīd and Matīwa al-Baḥar to raise 365 men for Akhrīrū on 26 July.¹ On 27 July, a reported 1,000 Rifis under Sī Maḥammad arrived at Sūq al-Aḥad of the Banū Zīyyāt, ready to move on the Wādī Lāw positions.² On 4 August, 200 men grouped at Agalal ready to move on Qala'a overlooking Shāwin.³ On 8 August, Rifī forces arrived at Mā'lā on the western side of the mountains dividing the Banū Sijjil from the Banū Zīyyat.⁴

At the end of the second week of August more attacks began. On 12 August, 70 men led by Akhrīrū attacked the Tangier to Tetuan road in the Wādī Ra's tribe,⁵ and a general attack was started on Spanish positions between Wādī Lāw and Ifartān. Telephone lines between Dār 'Aqūba and Sharūta were cut, and the civilian inhabitants of Sharūta were evacuated.⁶ On 13 August, 150 men were sent to the Ḥawz to persuade that tribe to rise.⁷

On 17 August, the Banū Ḥassan joined the Rifis and rose against the Spanish.⁸ Some of the Akhmās were now

¹ SHM Ceuta Leg. 24, Levantamiento de Cábilas, Gomara, T.O.C. Tte, enc. desp. to Cor. S.M.I. Wādī Lāw, 26 July 1924.

² Ibid., Telefonema Capt. Interv. Gomara to Cor. S.M.I., 27 July 1924.

³ Ibid., Akhmas, T.M. Tte Interv. Akhmas to Cor. S.M.I., Shāwin, 4 Aug. 1924.

⁴ Ibid., Gomara, T.O.C. Capt. Interv. Gomara to Cor. S.M.I., Wādī Lāw, 11 Aug. 1924.

⁵ Ibid., Wad Ras, T.O. Grl. Jefe to Cor. S.M.I., Tetuan, 12 Aug. 1924.

⁶ The Times, 14 Aug. 1924, p. 10, dated Madrid, 13 Aug. 1924.

⁷ SHM Ceuta Leg. 24, Levantamiento de Cábilas, Gomara, T.O.C. Capt. Interv. Gomara to Cor. S.M.I., Wādī Lāw, 13 Aug. 1924.

⁸ The Times, 18 Aug. 1924, p. 9, dated Madrid, 17 Aug. 1924, and Skīraj, op. cit., p. 134.

also becoming committed to the rising as well, and 500 men from the Gazāwa, Akhmās, and Banū Ḥuzmār were grouped in the tribe.¹ On the eastern side of Shāwin, the pro-Rifī forces were also approaching. Mūlāy Aḥmad al-Baqārī was reported in Igarmān in the Banū Sijjil with 800 men, on 19 August.²

Although the Spanish managed to relieve some of their positions--others, such as Khūj, remained cut off. Worse still, Spanish positions actually started to fall to the enemy. Tassa fell on 25 August and 45 Moroccan Regulares and one Spanish Lieutenant were taken prisoner.³

On 2 September, the Rifīs prepared to lay siege to Tagsūt and Tala'at Adgūz, on either side of the Wādī Talambūṭ, a tributary of the Wādī Lāw.⁴ The position at Wādī Lāw itself had been cut off on 28 August both by besieging forces and gales at sea. The Banū Idhīr and Wādī Ra's tribes joined the rising.⁵ At the end of August the attacks had spread to the Larache zone, and the postal service between Tetuan and Tangier was suspended, so dangerous had the road become.⁶

On 4 September, The Times reported that the tribes in the North-west of the Spanish zone were joining the

¹ SHM Ceuta Leg. 24, Levantamiento de Cábilas, Akhmas, T.O. Tte. Cor. S.M.I. to Grl. Jefe and Cte. Grl., Tetuan, 29 Aug. 1924.

² Ibid., Telefónema Tte. Cor. S.M.I. to Gl. Jefe, Tetuan, 19 Aug. 1924.

³ SHM Ceuta Leg. 24, Levantamiento de Cábilas, Akhmas, T.O.C. Capt. Interv. Akhmas to Cor. S.M.I., Shāwin, 26 Aug. 1924.

⁴ Ibid., T.O. Tte. Interv. Akhmas to Cor. S.M.I., Shāwin, 2 Sept. 1924, Urgentissimo.

⁵ The Times, 29 Aug. 1924, p. 10, dated Tangier, 28 Aug. 1924.

⁶ Ibid., 1 Sept. 1924, p. 10, dated Tangier, 31 Aug. 1924.

rebellion.¹ The pro-Rifī movement had been gathering force in the area for some time. Its initiator was the Sharif Sīdī al-Ṭayyib al-Ḥadāwī, head of the Nāsirīyya zawiya at al-Ramla in the Banū Masawar. Before joining the Rifīs he asked permission of the head of the Nāsirīyya in Marrakesh. This permission was given, but he was recommended to find out more about the leadership of the Rifī movement. To this end he made contact with the Rifī representative in Tangier, Sī 'Abd al-Karīm b. al-Ḥājj 'Alī Luḥ, the brother-in-law of Ra'īs Misa'ūd "Sibara", who answered him that it was "an Islamic national revolution against the conquering foreigner."²

This assurance was apparently sufficient and when al-Ḥadāwī had smuggled in enough supplies from Tangier he started operations. He was joined by 120 men from the Banū Ḥassan, and then by a group under Sī al-'Arbī b. Ḥamīma of the Banū Idhīr. The Spanish position at Sūq al-Thalathā' of Banū Idhīr was surrounded, as was Adrū just over the border in the Banū 'Arūs.³ On 4 September Adrū fell.⁴ The next target, as the Spanish foresaw, was their large garrison at Bū Kharraysh in the Banū Idhīr, which was surrounded on 5 September.⁵ Bū Kharraysh ran out of water by 13 September.⁶

In the face of these attacks, Primo decided to make a final effort to carry out the planned withdrawal which had

¹ Ibid., 5 Sept. 1924, p. 10, dated Tangier, 4 Sept. 1924.

² Al-Bū 'Ayyāshī, op. cit., Vol. II, pp. 242-243.

³ Ibid., p. 245.

⁴ SHM Ceuta Leg. 24, Levantamiento de Cábilas, Beni Ider y Beni Lait, T.O.C. Tte. Interv. Beni Ider to Cor. S.M.I., Bū Kharraysh, 4 Sept. 1924.

⁵ Ibid., T.O.C. Tte. Interv. B. Ider to Cor. S.M.I. Bū Jarraysh, 7 Oct. 1924.

⁶ Ibid., T.O. Interv. to Cor. S.M.I., Bū Jarraysh, 13 Sept. 1924, and al-Bū 'Ayyāshī, op. cit., Vol. II, p. 245.

been put off in August precisely because of the Rīfī offensive. Under the successive attacks of the Rīfīs and their supporters, willing or unwilling, the operation was now even more difficult than it would have been then.

The extent of the problem was enormous. Nearly all the Spanish positions were under siege. The Spanish were unable even to set up a protective position at Banū Salāḥ, only two miles from the Protectorate capital of Tetuan, which did not augur well for the establishment of the protective line from Tetuan to Tangier, protecting the road between the two cities, behind which Primo intended to retire. The road itself was still closed. Even Shāwin was cut off. The Spanish army, therefore, had two objectives: firstly to relieve and withdraw the besieged positions, and secondly to open the Tangier to Tetuan road. On 7 September, the post of Tagsūt in the Wādī Lāw valley was evacuated;¹ on 8 September, that at Amṭār on the coast was withdrawn as well.² At the same time the rising against the Spanish was spreading. The sharīfs of the Wādī Ra's tribe agreed to join it on 8 September,³ and on 9 September representatives of the Akhmās met a Rīfī group in Bāb Tāza and agreed on an immediate attack on all the Spanish positions, and to attack the supply convoys between Shāwin and Drā' al-Asaf. They were joined by men from the Banū Aḥmad, Gazāwa and Banū Sa'id al-Gharb.⁴ On 13 September, Qā'id bin Ṭayyib of the Banū Sijjil left Shāwin to join the Rīfīs. Two days later,

¹ The Times, 8 Sept. 1924, p. 12, dated Tangier, 7 Sept. 1924.

² Ibid., 9 Sept. 1924, p. 12, dated Tangier, 8 Sept. 1924.

³ SHM Ceuta Leg. 24, Levantamiento de Cábilas, Anjra, T.O.C. Capt. Interv. to Cor. S.M.I., Condesa, 9 Sept. 1924.

⁴ Ibid., Akhmas, T.O.C. Tte. Cor. S.M.I. to Grl. Jefe, Tetuan, 10 Sept. 1924.

Tighīsas, al-Qubā'. Darsa, Tisgarīn and Sharūda (the last three in the lower Wādī Lāw valley) were abandoned.¹

The road to Shāwin was cleared on 12 September,² but the revolt against the Spanish was spreading to the 'Anjara, behind the Spanish defence line, and preparations were made to attack the Spanish position at al-Qaṣr al-Saghīr on the coast.³

Meanwhile, Sī Maḥammad had moved his headquarters to Talambūṭ, followed by an extension of the telephone lines, and Rīfī forces continued to arrive in the western Jibāla and Ghumāra. Large numbers of Rīfīs were reported in Qala'a and Imharshān behind Shāwin on 16 September, and 500 more men arrived on 22 September.⁴

The Spanish now attempted to send a column through to Shāwin. On 19 September, The Times reported, 40,000 troops were moving up from Tetuan to relieve the 3,000 troops in Shāwin itself, and the others in the vicinity of Shāwin.⁵ They also tried to persuade al-Raisūlī to leave Tazarūt, as once they had gone they would be unable to protect him, but this was quite unsuccessful.⁶

Al-Raisūlī himself was the object of a fairly consistent campaign to join the Rīfīs. Bin 'Abd al-Karīm had

¹ Ibid., T.O.C. Capt. Interv. Ajmas to Cor. S.M.I., Shāwin, 13 Sept. 1924.

² Fleming, op. cit., p. 179.

³ SHM Ceuta Leg. 24, Levantamiento de Cábilas, Anjra, T.O.M. Capt. Interv. to Cor. Jefe S.M.I., Condesa, 13 Sept. 1924.

⁴ Ibid., Gomara, T.O.C. Tte. encargado Interv. to Cor. S.M.I., Wādī Lāw, 17 Sept. 1924, and Ajmas, T.O.C. Capt. Interv. to Cor. S.M.I., Shāwin, 16 Sept. 1924, and al-Bū 'Ayyāshī, op. cit., Vol. II, p. 219.

⁵ The Times, 20 Sept. 1924, p. 10, dated Tangier, 19 Sept. 1924.

⁶ Ibid., 22 Sept. 1924, p. 10, dated Tangier, 21 Sept. 1924.

written several times to the sharīf at Tazarūt, asking for his cooperation, requests which al-Raisūlī refused. Bin 'Abd al-Karīm turned to threats. If al-Raisūlī did not join the struggle against the Spanish the Rifis would turn on him in Tazarūt before they dealt with the "Christians". In a piece of bitter, but highly apposite, irony bin 'Abd al-Karīm referred to Tazarūt as "the Madrid of the Jibāla". To these threats al-Raisūlī replied:

"Close your eyes, take stock and you will see that this is an ocean which you may not cross, for this is no way to make war. To make war in accordance with the law, you must first respect your brothers, then you must respect the law, respect the habus, in that way you can make war on the Christian, and God the merciful will help you. Moreover the image fades, and only reality remains. Our only desire is peace and to avoid the shedding of blood which is today quite useless."¹

Al-Raisūlī retaliated to bin 'Abd al-Karīm's claim to represent the sharī'a by stating quite categorically that he was not, because he had illegally "nationalised" the habus properties. Bin 'Abd al-Karīm replied by saying that al-Raisūlī's treachery to his religion was the greater. He might respect the habus properties--which after all was in al-Raisūlī's interest--but he had committed the much worse offence of cooperating with the Christians:

"You should know, O Sharif, that we are quite aware of what you are. You aspire only to personal [greatness], scattering over your brothers the filthy mud of the Christians. Your love for them is public knowledge. Your rejection of your Islamic faith is also public and notorious. Those Muslims who believed that you were like them, you have thrown into the sea of iniquity. As a result of this, soon, very soon, we will come upon you and those who would defend you. This is our last letter to you."²

¹ Intervención Larache, Beni Aros, p. 47. The quoted passage is translated from a Spanish translation of the original.

² Ibid.

Once again, despite bin 'Abd al-Karīm's later disclaimers of jihād, the propaganda war between the Rifi leader and al-Raisūlī was expressed in terms of religion. But there was a difference. Al-Raisūlī saw religious principle in terms of what had been the custom in Morocco for centuries, the importance of the sharīfs and their economic and religious prestige. Bin 'Abd al-Karīm, on the other hand, presented a new approach to Islām, that the resources of Islām should be used to strengthen and defend the Islamic state. This was Islamic nationalism in a modern manifestation and the different attitudes of the two concepts are most clearly expressed in these letters. Walter Harris also realised the difference between this new Islamic nationalism and the old concept of jihād, although he expressed it in a rather simplified form:

"There is no 'Holy War' at all, though they imagine they are carrying on one. It is purely the nationalistic desire to clear the Spaniard out--and he is going in fact, anyhow out of the Rif and Jibala districts."¹

The Spanish were indeed leaving the Jibāla with increasing speed, but first they had to relieve Shāwin. Spanish troops finally reached the city at just after midday on 30 September, ten days after they had set out.² The Spanish casualties in the previous two weeks (from 18 September to 1 October) over the whole zone had been between 4,000 and 5,000 killed and wounded,³ and the Spanish had still to fight their way back from Shāwin.

Spanish positions continued to be withdrawn, not all of them intact. Bū Kharraysh in the Banū Idhīr, which had been besieged since the beginning of September, surrendered on 11 October. The 400-strong garrison was allowed to withdraw to Tetuan unmolested, but they left behind all their supplies, including about 1,000 rifles and over 400,000 rounds of ammunition, which were impounded by a local Waryaghli "interventor".¹

¹ T.A.H.P. file, "The Times Correspondence, 1894-1933", Harris to Williams (Foreign Editor of The Times), Tangier, 4 Oct. 1924.

² The Times, 1 Oct. 1924, p. 14, dated Madrid, 30 Sept. 1924.

³ Ibid., 8 Oct. 1924, p. 13, dated Tangier, 7 Oct. 1924.

By this time, the morale of the pro-Rifi forces was reaching a very high pitch. As early as 10 September, Walter Harris was reporting that he had great difficulty in dissuading Moroccans that the Rifi state did not have the support of the British government,² which would have set the seal of international approval on Rifi independence. At the beginning of October, Harris was writing to the Foreign Editor of The Times that he had been visited by several "more or less important rebels and they seem intoxicated with their successes."³

The raised morale was carefully fostered by the Rifi government. In the Rif, a total ban was imposed on any discussion of the casualties in the western zone, which were very heavy. Indeed, in order to counteract the wild rumours about the huge numbers of casualties, bin 'Abd al-Karīm decided to make use of the great propaganda value of the continuing Spanish withdrawal, by ordering the ṭālībs in the tribes to pray and to recite suitable verses from the Qur'ān in thanks for the victories over Spain in the west and "for the proximity of the Muslim liberation."¹

¹ U.S.M.I., XXIII, p. 10418, and al-Bū 'Ayyāshī, op. cit., Vol. II, p. 247.

² The Times, 11 Sept. 1924, p. 12, dated Tangier, 10 Oct. 1924.

³ T.A.H.P. file, "The Times Correspondence, 1894-1933", Harris to Williams, Tangier, 4 Oct. 1924.

The "Muslim liberation" was brought even closer by the threat from behind the Spanish defence line from Tangier to Tetuan. The 'Anjara tribe was on the point of rising again. A Spanish convoy was attacked on the border of the international zone on 21 October. On 25 October, telephone lines to Spanish positions were cut.

The principal instigators in this movement in the 'Anjara were two men, 'Abd al-Qādir b. Muḥammad Kanya, known as Qadur Kanya, and Sī 'Abd al-Salām Bū Ganayn, known as Janāna. Both had turbulent histories and as they will reappear it is suitable to recount these now. Qadur Kanya came from an important family in the 'Aanjar. His father Muḥammad had been an extremely tough qā'id of the tribe in the time of Mūlāy Ḥassan, until he was murdered. In 1916, Qadur, and his brother 'Alī, had joined the strong anti-al-Raisūlī party in the 'Anjara, until in the course of factional fighting 'Alī was killed, whereupon Qadur joined the al-Raisūlī party. He remained loyal to al-Raisūlī after the latter's break with the Spanish in 1918, but later fell out with the Raisūlist qā'id of the tribe, who held him prisoner for some time. His resultant opposition to al-Raisūlī attracted the attention of Rifī agents in the 'Anjara, and they persuaded him to join them. He joined Akhrīrū, who gave him some men, with whom he returned to his tribe, raised more recruits, many of them former members of the Fuerzas Regulares, and returned to help in the siege of Bū Kharraysh. His companion in these campaigns in the ¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 25, Información Octubre, nota, 4 Oct. 1924, and nota, 13 Oct. 1924.

'Anjara, Janāna, was from a lesser family altogether, a man who had gained his prestige as a robber, specialising in attacking the convoys from Tetuan to Shāwin.¹

On 29 October, these two men attended a meeting in one of the zawiyas in the 'Anjara, which reached no very firm decision on whether to call a general rising in the tribe.² Of course this did not satisfy the two agitators, and on 2 November, Janāna was reported to have met bin Ḥalīma of the Banū Idhīr to ask him for help.³ This was evidently forthcoming, for on 8 November it was reported that 600 Rifīs were on the way and that bin Ḥalīma was ready to send 600 more men to the 'Anjara, Wādī Ra's and Ḥawz tribes.⁴ However, the 'Anjara as a whole still showed themselves rather reluctant to enter the war definitely, and on 10 November, bin 'Abd al-Karīm was reported to have written to them, insulting them and calling them "Jews", and ordering them to join him.⁵

However, if the Rifīs were not yet succeeding with the 'Anjara, they were doing well in the organisation of other Jibālan tribes. Akhrīrū imposed control on the Banū Ḥassan, for example, by instructing his deputy in that tribe to ensure that a qā'id and a muqaddam were appointed, and to collect up all the arms, which were to be distributed only

¹ Oficina Central de Intervención y Tropas Indígenas de Tetuán, Datos sobre los principales cabecillas rebeldes de la cabila de Anyera, n.d. in BNES de A, pp. 1 and 13-14 (henceforth referred to as "Cab.Reb. Anyera").

² SHM Ceuta Leg. 25, Política Octubre 1924, Información del día, 29 Oct. 1924.

³ SHM Ceuta Leg. 25, Política Noviembre 1924, Información del día, 2 Nov. 1924.

⁴ Ibid., Información del día, 8 Nov. 1924.

⁵ Ibid., Información del día, 10 Nov. 1924.

when men went out to fight. The qā'id who was appointed, one Sī al-Matī (sic) of Bastu, had considerable difficulty in carrying out this instruction but he managed it in the end.¹ In other tribes a similar measure of control was being imposed. Bin Ḥalīma, in the Banū Idhīr, ordered that no one was to go to the market in Tetuan, and threatened to confiscate the property of anyone who did. The same rule applied in the Wādī Ra's, where the penalty was a fine and 500 lashes. This was completely effective, for on 12 November, the Spanish reported that "Today no one from the Wād Ras has been seen in the market."²

The Spanish withdrawal went on. Wādī Lāw was evacuated by sea on 15 November and the evacuation of Shāwin started on the same day. The troops were unmolested while they withdrew from the city.³ There was a simple reason for this. On 15 November, as the Spanish started to leave the city (a process that took two days in itself), a deputation went to the 700 Akhmās, Rīfīs and others waiting nearby, to ask them that they should not attack the city itself. This was agreed and the pro-Rīfī leaders promised not to attack until the Spanish had reached Dār 'Aqūba.⁴ (see Photograph XI: 1).

The attack duly materialised at Dār 'Aqūba. Sharūta was also attacked, and there were very heavy losses. However, the forces managed to retreat as far as Sūq al-Arba'a of

¹ SHM Ceuta Leg. 25, Política Octubre de 1924, Información del día, 26 Oct. 1924, and Información del día, 30 Oct. 1924.

² SHM Ceuta Leg. 25, Política Noviembre de 1924, Información del día, 3 Nov. 1924, and Información del día, 12 Nov. 1924.

³ The Times, 18 Nov. 1924, p. 14, dated Madrid, 17 Nov. 1924, and Fleming, op. cit., p. 190.

⁴ SHM Ceuta Leg. 25, Política Noviembre de 1924, Información del día, 15 Nov. 1924.

Photograph XI: 1

The centre of Shāwin before its evacuation by Spanish troops

Source: The Illustrated London News, 25 October
- 1924, p. 767.

Banū Ḥassan, where they regrouped on 25 November. Fighting continued until 13 December, when the last Spanish troops entered Tetuan. The losses had been enormous. The withdrawal from Shāwin, according to Harris--who gives a relatively low estimate compared with others--had cost 800 officers dead and 17,000 men.¹ Behind them they left a huge amount of supplies, military buildings, and even a hospital in Shāwin. "It will be curious," the Madrid correspondent of The Times remarked, "to see what use the Moors will make of these elements of civilisation."² In fact the "Moors" preserved Shāwin intact, as they had promised its inhabitants and the hospital was preserved for use.³ As soon as the Spanish had left the city, it was occupied for the Rifis by Sī Sha'ib b. Muḥammad Awqiriuh, who appointed Muḥammad Bainainu, "who was the foremost among the Muslims [i.e., pro-Rifis] of his hometown of Shawin,"⁴ as Pasha of the city. Sī Maḥammad confirmed Binainu's appointment, and himself showed exaggerated respect for the city, when he entered it on 14 December. Reportedly, he took his shoes off before passing through its gates. But after a speech of welcome in ¹ Harris, op. cit., p. 147. Other estimates of casualties ranged from the Conde de Romananes' information of 16,000 casualties, Hernández Mir's estimate of 18,000 casualties, and General Lopéz de Ochoa's claim of 16,000 Spanish troops alone, that is excluding the Moroccan casualties in the Fuerzas Regulares. Fleming, working on daily military reports in the S.H.M., estimates a much lower figure, about 2,000 Spanish lives. The whole question is discussed at length in Fleming, op. cit., pp. 193-195. In any case, the important point from the Moroccan point of view was not the number of Spanish casualties, but the fact that all the Spanish forces withdrew from the Jibāla.

² The Times, 13 Dec. 1924, dated Madrid, 12 Dec. 1924.

³ Sheean, Adventures, pp. 250-251. According to Sheean, it was in the care of a "Danish surgeon from Tangier." It is possible that he made a mistake and that the surgeon was the Norwegian Hutyens. See above, p. 562.

⁴ Skiraj, op. cit., p. 135.

which he congratulated the "good Muslims" who were prepared to fight for independence, Sī Maḥammad himself quickly left the city, on his brother's instructions, for fear of Spanish air raids. He retired to Talambūṭ, and then to Tagsūt, the main Rīfī headquarters in the Jibāla.¹ Here he remained, in the company of Bū Laḥya and Aḥmad Bū Drā, with whom he had come from the Rīf--partly by boat--to take charge in the Ghumāra.²

The usual consequence of Rīfī domination quickly followed: a road was started between Talambūṭ and Shāwin;³ qā'ids were appointed--a Shaykh Bukhūt in the Jabal Ḥabīb, and al-Ḥāshim b. Ḥamīma in the Banū Idhīr,⁴ who would soon rebel against the Rīfīs. In the Banū Ḥassan, Aḥmad b. Sa'id al-Ḥassanī was made qā'id. The choice for the Banū Sa'id is interesting, for it was Muḥammad al-Baqqālī Wuld al-Qurfa, who was the principal anti-Raisūlist qā'id in 1920.⁵ In the Banū Aḥmad, there was another interesting appointment, the Ṭālib Muḥammad al-Shawnī, who originated from the Sumāta. He had hated al-Raisūlī ever since the sharīf had ordered the blinding of his cousin. He swore vengeance against al-Raisūlī, but was arrested and imprisoned by him, and after that gave out that he had forgotten his enmity, and even succeeded in becoming a shaykh after al-Raisūlī made his peace with the Spanish in 1922. When the opportunity came,

¹ SHM Ceuta Leg. 25, Política Diciembre, Información del día, 14 Dec. 1924, and Hernández Mir, op. cit., Vol. III, pp. 25-1253, and Cab.Reb. 1913-1927, p. 43.

² Skīraj, op. cit., p. 138.

³ SHM Ceuta Leg. 25, Política Diciembre, Información del día, 23 Dec. 1924.

⁴ Ibid., Información del día, 28 Dec. 1924.

⁵ Skīraj, op. cit., p. 136. For Wuld al-Qurfa, see above pp. 272-273.

however, he switched sides again and joined Akhrīrū.¹

The Rifis took economic control as well. On 27 December it was reported that they were confiscating the property of everyone who had supported the Spanish and were impounding ḥabūs property. In the Akhmās, for instance, a large supply of olive oil which had been stored in a mosque was confiscated.² On the other hand, bin 'Abd al-Karīm agreed to extend credit to the Jibālīs--he ordered the Ghumāran and Jibālan tribes to send pack animals to Ajdir to collect wheat, sugar, candles and cloth, which was to be repaid later.³

Meanwhile the 'Anjara tribe behind the Spanish defence line had finally risen completely. The rebellion in this tribe had been fermenting for some time. There had been an attempt in October, instigated by Qadur Kanya and Janāna. Since then, they had been joined by a number of other leaders in the tribe. Friendship with Akhrīrū brought into the alliance al-'Arbī b. al-Khādir, who returned home to help the rising. He had joined the Rifis much earlier in 1924, in June, when he had left the tribe and gone to help Sī Muḥammad in the attacks on the Wādī Lāw positions.⁴ Since then he had been absent from the tribe. Another 'Anjārī who had behaved in a similar manner was Sī Muḥammad b. Muḥammad al-Mujāhid, a ṭālib who had been muqaddam of the tribe, but had joined the Rifis at the beginning on 1924 after a dispute with the Spanish appointed qā'id of the tribe, bin 'Alī.

¹ Ibid., p. 139, and Jefes Rebeldes en 1925-1927, El Talib Mohammed Chauni, typescript 1925, and Intervención Militar de Larache, Kabila de Sumata (Zaara, 1928).

² SHM Ceuta Leg. 25, Política Diciembre, Información del día, 27 Dec. 1924.

³ Ibid., Información del día, 31 Dec. 1924.

⁴ The Times, 15 Dec. 1924, p. 14.

After joining the Rifis, he had been given money for the purpose of propaganda in his tribe, becoming, in the words of a Spanish report, "the soul of all the movements in favour of the Rifī cause which arose in the tribe."¹ The movement was also joined by Sī Muḥammad b. al-Ḥusayn al-Gamīs al-Ḥasnāwī, a former Spanish makhzānī, and khalīfa of part of the Barqūqiyān clan. In 1918, he quarrelled with al-Raisūlī when the sharīf broke with Spain. After al-Raisūlī's agreement with Spain in 1923, he tried to get reinstated, in an attempt that, despite Spanish support, failed, for al-Raisūlī did not lay aside his grudges with ease. At this point, al-Ḥasnāwī gave up all hopes of advancement through the Spanish-al-Raisūlī alliance and joined al-'Arbī b. Ḥalīma of the Banū Idhīr in the siege of Bū Kharraysh. When that position fell on 15 October, he returned to his tribe, ready for a final rising.²

It was these men, some through disaffection, some through deep dislike of the Spanish, who organised the rising in the 'Anjar. On 5 December 1924, Qadur Kanya attacked a Spanish convoy at Sharūta and then moved on to lay siege to the Spanish position at Sūq al-Thalathā'. This was an extremely profitable enterprise on his part, for his share of the 102,000 pesetas which the Spanish paid for the peaceful evacuation of the position was no less than 20,000 pesetas.³

Meanwhile, Sī Muḥammad al-Mujāhid was helping in the attack on the Spanish position at al-Qaṣr al-Ṣaghīr on the coast.⁴ This operation was also successful and the

¹ Al-Bū 'Ayyāshī, op. cit., Vol. II, pp. 215-216.

² Cab. Reb. Anyara, pp. 10-11.

³ Ibid., p. 22.

⁴ Ibid., p. 18.

position fell on 12 December.¹ At the same time, the neighbouring tribe, the Hawz, had risen as well. The main instigator here was Muḥammad b. Sī Ḥaddu, known as Kurṭiṭū. He had been a soldier in the Spanish mīa in the Hawz for 3 years, but in 1919 had joined the forces fighting the Spanish at Dār bin Qurraysh. He had already fallen out with al-Raisūlī, for reasons that are not clear. When he robbed property from a friend of Ḥamīdu Sukkān, al-Raisūlī's important supporter who was killed in the Spanish offensive against Tazarūt in 1921, he fled to the Rīf, where he was at the time of the Spanish defeats. He became a trusted lieutenant of bin 'Abd al-Karīm, and was sent to the Jibāla and the Hawz to organise the resistance there.² It will be seen that the majority of these leaders in the past had fallen out with al-Raisūlī and they had now joined his principal enemy.

Not surprisingly, the Spanish were deeply concerned by these developments, for the rising in the 'Anjara and Hawz threatened not only the road from Tangier to Tetuan, but also the vital railway from Tetuan to Ceuta. An attempt to recapture al-Qaṣr al-Ṣaghīr failed on 19 December.³

By the end of December 1924, the Spanish forces had retreated behind their defence line--with the 'Anjara and Hawz in revolt and cooperating with the Rīfis behind those lines. It would seem, at first sight, a complete Rīfī victory. In fact, however, Rīfī domination of the Jibāla was by no means complete. The local people were perfectly prepared to cooperate with the Rifis to expel the Spanish, but they were less keen to have Spanish domination replaced by a Rifī one. The Akhmās in particular, who had provided many of the men for the assault on Spanish positions, were particularly opposed to Rifī methods of government--especially the expropriation of habus properties and the domination of their tribe. And while al-Raisūlī remained in the Jibāla, sick and fallen in prestige though he was, he was still able to provide a focus for resistance to Rifī domination.

¹ Ibid., p. 11, and The Times, 15 Dec. 1924, p. 14, dated Tangier, 12 Dec. 1924.

² Oficina Central de Intervención y Tropas Jalifianas de Tetuan, Datos sobre los principales cabecillas rebeldes de la cabila del Hauz, n.d. in BNES de A.

³ The Times, 20 Dec. 1924, dated Madrid, 19 Dec. 1924.

The Akhmās Revolt

One of the first problems the Rifis had to face in the Jibāla was what to do about al-Raisūlī. On 18 December, Sī Maḥammad and Akhrīrū went to Tazarūt to see al-Raisūlī to tell him that "he could no longer remain on the mountain [i.e., Jabal 'Alam] and that if he did not leave the area he would be taken to Ajdīr with his wives and children."¹ This had no effect whatever, so on 22 December Sī Maḥammad called a meeting of all the main pro-Rifī leaders in Taghzūt, at which it was decided to summon al-Raisūlī to a meeting at Mūlāy 'Abd al-Salām within three days so that he could agree to join the Rifī alliance.² It is doubtful that even if he had agreed to go to the meeting, al-Raisūlī would have been able to do so, so sick was he with dropsy. In any event he did not even answer the letter. Bū Lahya went to Mūlāy 'Abd al-Salām himself with a group from the Taghzūt ḥarka and made a speech attacking al-Raisūlī: and he and those who were with him swore to attack Tazarūt within a short while and to eliminate "the greatest Christian", as Bū Laḥya described al-Raisūlī. They then returned to Taghzūt.¹

¹ SHM Ceuta. Leg. 25, Política Diciembre 1924, Información del día, 22 Dec. 1924.

² Ibid., and Intervención Larache, Beni Aros, p. 48, and Skīraj, op. cit., p. 138.

However, a more urgent problem had arisen in the Akhmās. The Rīfīs had begun to expropriate the habus property, which itself sufficiently infuriated the local people; other grievances were felt as well. At the beginning of January 1925, reports started to circulate that Rīfī soldiers were raping women in the Akhmās,² precisely the same stories as those which spread in the Ghumāra in 1923.³ Whether or not they were true--and it is, of course, impossible to discover this now--they contributed to stirring up hatred for the Rīfīs. The Akhmāsīs had other objections as well--they resented the Rīfīs' control. They told Akhrīrū, who was furious about lack of cooperation from the tribe, that they resented not having been invited to attend the meeting at Mūlāy 'Abd al-Salām; that they objected to the authority of bin 'Abd al-Karīm, indeed they had never heard of a Sultan from the Rīf before, and felt that "now each tribe should rule itself as it wished"; and they complained that they had suffered many casualties in the attacks on the Spanish, and that in return they had been treated with contempt--Sī : Maḥammad had even forbidden them to enter the city of Shāwin carrying their arms.⁴

Indeed, immediately after the capture of Shāwin,

¹ Intervención Larache, Beni Aros, pp. 48-49.

² SHM Ceuta Leg. 25, Política Enero 1925, Información del día, 1 Jan. 1925, 1st report.

³ See above, p. 623.

⁴ SHM Ceuta Leg. 25, Política Enero 1925, Información del día, 1 Jan. 1925, 2nd report.

Sī Maḥammad had ordered the tribes to be disarmed and imposed a tax of 5 pts a week on each household, in all the villages.¹ Not surprisingly these measures led to resistance. The Akhmās made the traditional 'ar sacrifice of a bull to the Gazāwa to ask them for aid,² and at a meeting of some of the notables of the Banū Ḥassan, Banū Lait, Banū Idhīr, Banū Ḥuzmār and, above all, the Akhmās, at Dārdāra in the southern Akhmās, they agreed that "they could not allow a Rīfī foreigner to come to rule over them, making himself rich at their expense and prejudicing their interests."³ They challenged Sī Maḥammad to come and disarm them, probably hoping, as Spanish Military Intelligence guessed, that if he did so they would be able to capture him. As both Sī Maḥammad and the Spanish realised, the real instigator of all this was al-Raisūlī.⁴

Matters got worse for the Rīfīs. On 5 January 1925 the Akhmās, Banū Aḥmad and Gazāwa refused to supply men to the Rīfī ḥarka. On 8 January, the Rīfī appointed qā'id in the Banū Idhīr, Sī Hashāmī b. Ḥalīma, told the Rīfīs that so many men were not needed for the ḥarka and they would not supply any more. He also ejected the 150 Rīfīs who were in the tribe, saying there was not enough to feed them.⁵ Hunger in the Jibāla had already reached an appalling degree: in the Banū Ḥuzmār, the Spanish reported, people were reduced to making bread from "flour" made from the fruit of mastic trees (lentiscos), dried and ground. The people of Tetuan

¹ Ibid., Información del día, 3 Jan. 1925, 1st report.

² Ibid., Información del día, 1 Jan. 1925, 1st report.

³ Ibid., Información del día, 3 Jan. 1925, 1st report.

⁴ Ibid.

⁵ Ibid., Información del día, 8 Jan. 1925.

attempted to help them by throwing food over the walls of Tetuan at night.¹

On 9 January, Binainu, the Rifis' Pasha in Shāwin, tried to impose his authority. Supported by 80 men, he moved north from Shāwin to Imahārshān, on the way to Dār 'Aqūba and the Banū Ḥassan, presumably with the intention of stopping the revolt from spreading any further.² The Banū Ḥassan, taken by surprise, surrendered and sacrificed to Binainu on 10 January.³ If the rebellion against the Rifis was forestalled in the Banū Ḥassan, in the Akhmās it was just beginning. On the same day as the surrender of the Banū Ḥassan, 10 January, there was a struggle at the gates of Shāwin. The Rīfī and Ghumārī guards placed there to stop people from taking guns into the city tried to disarm an Akhmāsī. In the resulting struggle, a Ghumārī guard was killed. The Akhmāsī responsible was sentenced to death and despite local appeals for clemency, Sī Maḥammad confirmed the sentence.⁴

About this, and about the prices of essential commodities, the Akhmāsīs complained to al-Raisūlī. Prices were certainly high: wheat, for example was 50 pts a mudd. The sharīf said he quite agreed with them, and that it was the fault of the Rifis, which had led to the markets in Tetuan, Tangier and Asīla being closed to the Jibālīs. He then gave the Akhmāsīs arms with which to fight the Rifis.⁵

¹ Ibid., Información del día, 6 Jan. 1925, and Información del día, 7 Jan. 1925, 2nd report.

² Ibid., Información del día, 9 Jan. 1925, 2nd report and Hernández Mir, op. cit., Vol. II, pp. 254-255.

³ SHM Ceuta Leg. 25, Política Enero 1925, Información del día, 10 Jan. 1925, 2nd report.

⁴ Ibid., Información del día, 10 Jan. 1925, 1st report.

⁵ Ibid., Información del día, 11 Jan. 1925, 1st report.

The Akhmāsīs made good use of the weapons, for on 13 January they captured Binainu in the Jabal Khazā'in, where he had gone to try to reason with the Akhmāsī a'yān.¹ He was held by the Akhmāsīs for a few days and then was handed over to al-Raisūlī who, according to García Figueras, imprisoned him in "the most horrible cell in his prison." The rest of his ḥarka was killed, the bodies mutilated and their heads exhibited in the villages.²

The Akhmāsīs surrounded another Waryaghli qāid, one "al-'Ayyāshī", in the middle of their tribe, but he managed to get word to Sī Maḥammad, who was in Tighīsas at the time. Sī Maḥammad ordered all the Ghumārīs to join in the attack on the Akhmās;³ and on 14 January a ḥarka, made up of Rifīs and led by Akhrīrū, started to attack the rebels.⁴ According to Skīraj, the ḥarka consisted of 500 men and was quickly joined by another under al-Baqqālī Wuld al-Qūrfa.⁵ Late on 14 January, Akhrīrū ordered the burning of Amajrī, Banū Zid and al-Khazāna, south-east of Shāwin.⁶ On 18 January, Imahārshān, north of Shāwin was burned. The inhabitants of the village sacrificed to Sī Maḥammad, who was not inclined to be merciful and took most

¹ Ibid., Información del día, 13 Jan. 1925, 2nd report, and Skīraj, op. cit., p. 138.

² SHM Ceuta Leg. 25, Política Enero de 1925, Información del día, 18 Jan. 1925, 1st report, and Tomas García Figueras, Del Marruecos Feudal (Episodios de la vida del Cherif Raisuni) (Madrid, Barcelona, Buenos Aires, 1930), p. 209 (henceforth referred to as García Figueras, Marruecos Feudal), and Skīraj, op. cit., p. 138.

³ Ibid.

⁴ SHM Ceuta Leg. 25, Política Enero 1925, Información del día, 14 Jan. 1925, 1st report.

⁵ Skīraj, op. cit., p. 138.

⁶ SHM Ceuta Leg. 25, Política Enero 1925, Información del día, 14 Jan. 1925, 2nd report.

of the inhabitants prisoner. The next day Sī Maḥammad wrote to the inhabitants of the Akhmās saying that they should not fight Muslims, but Christians. To this the Akhmās replied that "What you have done in three months the Spanish did not do in three years,"¹ a reference to the social, political and, above all, economic effects of Rīfī rule.

On 21 January, Spanish Intelligence reported that the Rīfīs had "cut off many heads, and taken many women and children as prisoners to the Riff [sic]."² Nevertheless, al-Hashāmī b. Ḥalīma of the Banū Idhīr told his tribe that bin 'Abd al-Karīm was in touch with another Christian nation who would take over the Spanish Protectorate in Morocco, and that they were better off under the Spanish.³

On 25 January, a huge ḥarka of 800 men arrived from the Rīf. Akhrīrū took 300 of them to Dār 'Aqūba to attack the Banū Jabāra clan of the western Akhmās; the rest of the force went with Sī Yazīd b. Salāḥ, the qā'id of the Banū Razīn, to the area south-west from Shāwin. Within three days a large part of the tribe's dwellings had been burned.⁴ By 29 January, most of the Akhmās had submitted.⁵

The repression continued into the first part of February 1925. On 4 February, Akhrīrū was reported to have ordered the burning of villages in the Banū Jabāra clan of the Akhmās. More houses in al-Khazāna were burned as well.⁶

¹ Ibid., Información del día, 19 Jan. 1925, 2nd report.

² Ibid., Información del día, 21 Jan. 1925.

³ Ibid., Información del día, 23 Jan. 1925, 1st report.

⁴ Hernández Mir, op. cit., Vol. II, p. 355, and Skīraj, op. cit., pp. 138-139.

⁵ SHM Ceuta Leg. 25, Política Enero 1925, Información del día, 29 Jan. 1925, 1st report.

⁶ SHM Ceuta Leg. 25, Política Febrero 1925, Información del día, 4 Feb. 1925, 2nd report.

The fires of the burning villages of the southern Akhmās could be seen as far away as Wazzān in the French zone, to which many fugitives from Rīfī vengeance had fled.¹ The Akhmās revolt was over, for the Rīfīs had crushed it. As a final punishment, a fine of 250,000 pesetas was levied on the tribe.² All that remained was to deal with the instigator of much of the trouble, Mūlāy Aḥmad al-Raisūlī.

The Capture of al-Raisūlī

On 1 February 1925, Rīfī forces moved up from the Banū Issāf, to the south of the Banū 'Arūs, towards Tazarūt. Many of the sharīfs of the Banū 'Arūs went to Tazarūt to explain the danger to al-Raisūlī. He is reported to have replied to their anxieties with the enigmatic phrase, "The sky is far above the barking of dogs."³ Such misplaced optimism did not allay their fears, and they took much of their property to the zawiya of 'Abd al-Salām in the hopes that there at least it would be respected. They asked al-Raisūlī to distribute arms, but the sharīf clearly knew he was defeated and replied, speaking of the forces that were massing against him: "They cannot take away my dreams: who are they to do so?"⁴

But Tazarūt was surrounded, and the night before the attack, al-Raisūlī was warned that it would come at dawn. To this he replied: "Thanks be to God, the All-Powerful, now

¹ SHAT, Maroc Fez 157, Quotidiens Politiques 1925, Report from Captain Giacomoni, Cercle de Ouezzan, Telegram No. 20, 20 Jan. 1925. I am indebted to Mr. George Joffe for this reference.

² Hernández Mir, op. cit., Vol. II, p. 355.

³ Intervención Larache, Beni Aros, p. 49.

⁴ Ibid.

I am able to see who are Jews and the sons of Jews . . ."¹
 He then distributed arms in a last attempt to hold off the attack, despite the appeals of many of the inhabitants of Tazarūt willage, who appealed to him to surrender, a request which the sharīf met with the taunt that "only Jews ask for mercy."²

Tazarūt was attacked in the morning of 8 February 1924, and after Rīfī reinforcements arrived in the evening, al-Raisūlī's supporters deserted him (see Photograph XI: 2). He then surrendered to the pro-Rīfī forces. By this time, practically all the principal pro-Rīfī leaders in the Jibāla and Ghumāra had joined the attack, including Akhrīrū, Mūlāy, Aḥmad al-Baqqālī, Wuld al-Qūrfa of the Banū Sa'īd, Bū Laḥya and others of lesser importance. Binainu was released and demanded the immediate execution of his prison guard. The other supporters of al-Raisūlī were told that they were traitors to Islam, and were ordered to bury their enemies' dead. Al-Raisūlī's supporters were left unburied, "to be eaten by the dogs and crows."³

Al-Raisūlī himself was transported on a specially made litter--for he could not walk or ride on account of his illness--to Shāwin, then to Tagsūt, where he was seen by Vincent Sheean, the American journalist who had managed to enter the Rīf. Finally, he was moved down to the coast and taken by boat to the Rīf, where he was imprisoned in Tamasind in the Banū Waryaghal.⁴ The rest of his family were lodged

¹ Intervención Larache, Beni Aros, p. 50.

² García Figueras, Marruecos Feudal, p. 214.

³ Intervención Larache, Beni Aros, p. 53, and Skiraj, op. cit., p. 139.

⁴ Intervención Larache, Beni Aros, pp. 53-54, and Sheean, Adventures, pp. 293-295.

Photograph XI: 2 .

Al-Raisūlī's supporters before their defeat
by Rifī troops .

Source: The Illustrated London News, 7 February
1925, p. 204

at Snāda.¹

Al-Raisūlī, unrepentant to the last, accused bin 'Abd al-Karīm of behaving with greater cruelty than the Spanish. To this bin 'Abd al-Karīm again replied that al-Raisūlī had betrayed Morocco to the Christians. Nevertheless, despite the decision of a meeting of the 'ulamā' of the Rīfī tribes that al-Raisūlī be put to death for his treachery to Islam, this was vetoed by bin 'Abd al-Karīm.

The booty that was taken from Tazarūt was enormous. 75,000 Spanish pesetas and 40 cases of ammunition figured among the principal items. They were not, however, shared out among the victorious Rīfīs and their supporters, but were impounded by Sī al-'Arbī b. Ḥalīma, who was instructed to take charge of them³--yet another sign of the centralising authority of the Rīfī state.

Since October, the Spanish had been completely ejected from the Jibāla, the revolt of the Akhmās had been crushed, and the major figure of resistance had been defeated. The Rīfī state stretched from the Timsamān to the walls of Tetuan, and bin 'Abd al-Karīm had reached the height of his power.

Conclusion

The events of the latter part of 1923, 1924, and the beginning of 1925 were confusing. This is not to be wondered at, for the Rīfī state was facing, fighting, and, most important of all, defeating a number of enemies, and strangely enough the least important and least dangerous of these enemies were the Spanish. This may seem paradoxical, for the Rifi state had been formed out of the need to oppose the advancing Spanish armies in 1921. However, the very existence of that new state so changed the political and social structure of the area that it was the threat from internal enemies which was the most serious. From these conflicts--which took the form of revolts against the Rifis--a number of themes emerge.

¹ Skīraj, op. cit., p. 139.

² Intervención Larache, Beni Aros, pp. 54-55.

³ SHM Ceuta Leg. 25, Política Febrero 1925, Información del día, 10 Feb. 1925.

The first theme is the nature of Rifi authority. As Rifi dominion extended over a new area, a number of things happened. In the first place they collected taxes. This was resented by the local people, not simply because they disliked paying taxes--for contributions had been exacted from them in various ways by qā'ids before--but because they were so heavy and because the ability to collect taxes was the symbol of an outside authority which was governing them. There were other symbols as well--the Rifi telephone lines, emphasising the technical superiority of their new masters, the building of Rifi maḥakmas and command posts. Significantly, at least some of the Ghumārīs referred to the latter as "fisīna", recalling the practice of the other power in the area which was competing for the control of the Ghumāra--the Spanish. Furthermore, as the territories of the different tribes were occupied by the Rifis, the new authorities attempted to disarm them, just as the Spanish had attempted to do or would like to have done. In fact, this was just as much a "foreign domination" as the Spanish had been. The Ghumārīs recognised this when they told the Buqquya they could leave during the rebellion of May and June 1924; their quarrel was with the Banū Waryaghāl. The Akhmās expressed the same view when they said that they had never heard of a Rīfī Sultan, nor would they permit "foreigners" to prejudice their standards of living.

The second theme, inextricably linked with this, is why local people initially supported the Rifis. In the case of certain individuals the reasons are clear enough. Some were implacably opposed to the Spanish. Such men were Qadur Kunya of the 'Anjāra, and above all Aḥmad Akhrīrū: of the Banū Ḥuzmār. Akhrīrū's hatred for the Christians is clearly expressed in a letter he wrote to bin 'Abd al-Karīm in April 1924. After the customary greetings he went on:

"We were, before this, among the maḥalla [armed groups] of the enemies of God and his Prophet in the tribes of Banū Ḥazmār, in the Banū Ma'dān [a clan of the Banū Ḥuzmār] and the Banū Sa'id, and we kindled the war in all the tribes around the city of Tetuan--may God return it to the Dār al-Islām . . . We started fighting [in the neighbourhood of Tetuan] with five men from the Police [i.e., the Spanish P.I.]--may God annihilate them . . . Then the Infidels from Tetuan arrested our brother Muslims from the Banū Ma'dān and Banū Ḥuzmār . . . Then we went to the city of Tetuan and with the help of God and his Prophet we carried off six infidels--three adults and three children. The three adults, they were people who are held among them in honour as wise and respected--may God annihilate them."

He continued in such terms at some length.¹

Others, like Kurṭiṭū, who worked for the Spanish in the past, joined the Rifis because they had fallen out with the Spanish and al-Raisūlī so that the Rifis were their only hope of safety.

Others joined out of opportunism or out of a desire to drive out the Spanish, but not to be dominated by the Rifis afterwards. Such a one was al-Hashāmī b. Ḥalīma, whom the Rifis made qā'id of his tribe, the Banū Idhīr, but who turned against them at the time of the Akhmās revolt.

¹ MAEF, Maroc 519, p. 193, Aḥmad Akhrīrū to Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Karīm, 14 Ramaḍān 1342/19 April 1924.

Others, still, never joined the Rifis--particularly al-Raisūlī, 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Darqāwī, and the Bujdayn family of the Timsamān. They also happened to be sharīfs, connected with powerful religious orders.

This battle between bin 'Abd al-Karīm and the ṭarīqas is a third theme of the chapter. The conflict was expressed in religious terms. The religious reforms of bin 'Abd al-Karīm were anathema to the ṭarīqas: he expropriated ḥabus property for the war effort, and disapproved of their practices and rituals. Above all, he expected obedience. To a man like al-Raisūlī, such an expectation was, to put it mildly, an impertinence. He, al-Raisūlī, was a sharīf, a descendant of the Prophet, while bin 'Abd al-Karīm was a nobody, and al-Raisūlī contemptuously dismissed him as "the son of a faqīh". There was a political objection on bin 'Abd al-Karīm's part to the ṭarīqas, for he could not, if his centralised authority was to remain unchallenged, allow powerful groups within the state. Directly on the border was 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Darqāwī, the head of the most extensive order in the Rif, the Darqāwīya. Since he would not join him, and it must be remembered that bin 'Abd al-Karīm tried to persuade him to do so, he had to be defeated. This attempt was not successful in the case of 'Abd al-Raḥmān, but it was in that of al-Raisūlī--again after many attempts to persuade him to join the Rifis. What was really at stake was power. The ṭarīqas and the sharīfs could combine against bin 'Abd al-Karīm, and did so, and therefore they had to be defeated.

The importance of these local power struggles can be seen in the case of 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu and Bil-Qīsh as well. Their objectives were to maintain their own positions in their tribes, and they failed, just as the religious leaders had failed, because of the necessity, for the Rīfī state, of limiting their power. Their other ally, 'Abd al-Mālīk, was forced to flee to the Spanish to organise his ḥarka. He was killed in a skirmish on the eastern front on 7 August 1924.¹

On the other hand, bin 'Abd al-Karīm was quite content to leave in peace those sharīfs and ṭarīqa leaders who agreed to place themselves under his authority. This was particularly true of the Akhamlīshīn family, who were given positions of authority in the tribes. Sī Maḥammad b. Ṣadīq of the chief Akhamlīshī zawiya of Bū Ghīlab practically ruled the Sinhāja for bin 'Abd al-Karīm; Sī Maḥammad b. 'Alī al-Ḥākīm, head of the Akhamlīshī zawiya of Agunī b. Barrī, was made Pasha of the Banū Aḥmad; Sī Aḥmad Jaddī of the Akhamlīshī zawiya of al-Taffāḥ was made Pasha of the Banū 'Amārt; and outside the Akhamlīshī family, Sī al-Ḥashmī b. al-Ḥassan of the zawiya of Afghāl was made qā'id of the Banū Samīḥ.²

It was not even a question of all of a particular family or a particular order being for or against the Rīf. Clearly 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Darqāwī was opposed to bin 'Abd al-Karīm, but the sharīfs of the Darāwīya zawiya at Tuzghān in the Ghumāra cooperated with the Rīfīs. They had been doing so at least since 1922, for Skīraj describes an incident when a messenger came from the titular head of the zawiya, Muḥammad b. Ṣadīq, who was living in Tangier, and tried to intervene in the negotiations over the ransoming of the Spanish prisoners. In his letter, Muḥammad b. Ṣadiq also asked that the zawiya be respected. Bin 'Abd al-Karīm replied that the zawiya was safe and its faqīhs were acting as good Muslims, and that if Muḥammad b. Ṣadiq was as good a Muslim he would come to join them. However, on 1926, Muḥammad b. Ṣadiq was still living in Tangier.¹ Also, as this chapter has described, the Nasiriyyīn were similarly divided. Al-Hadāwī of al-Ramla near Tangier supported the Rifis while the Bujdayn family in the Timsamān were opposed. Even the Akhamlīshīn had produced two supporters of the Ghumāra revolt in 1924.

¹ Fleming, op. cit., p. 175, and SHM Melilla Leg. 22, Cartas Arabes, Benī Tuzīn, 'Allāl b. Muḥammad to Colonel, 8 Muḥarram 1343/9 Aug. 1924.

² Drague/Spillman, op. cit., p. 109.

It must be repeated that the question came down to power. Those families of marabūts or sharīfs, those zawiyas which were prepared to cooperate with bin 'Abd al-Karīm in the new order, were left in peace. Those that tried to protect themselves by allying themselves with the French or Spanish might claim that bin 'Abd al-Karīm, by taking over ḥabūs property, and by forcing them to accept his authority, was acting in a way opposed to their religious prestige, but they were unsuccessful. Bin 'Abd al-Karīm described them as traitors to Islam and tried--and in most cases succeeded--in crushing them. There was no place for ṭarīqas in the salāfiya interpretation of the sharī'a, but neither was there a place for them in the political structure of the Rifī state, if they tried to assert an independent existence.

The final theme to emerge during the year 1924 was the possibility of conflict with the French. Bin 'Abd al-Karīm may have been brought in against his will, but if his enemies in the Rif, Sinhāja and Jibāla sought backing from the

¹ Skīraj, op. cit., p. 73, and Cerdeira, op. cit., p. 66, n. 1.

French, and if the French insisted on occupying territory which it was both politically and economically necessary that he should control, conflict was inevitable. The fighting stopped in 1924, but the threat of its renewal remained, and it was conflict with the French that would eventually destroy the Rifi state.

Chapter XII

THE RĪFĪ STATE AT THE HEIGHT OF ITS POWER--THE INVASION OF THE FRENCH ZONE JANUARY TO SEPTEMBER 1925

After the withdrawal of the Spanish troops from Shāwin to the defensive line from Tetuan to Alcazarquivir, and the abandonment of most of the Jibāla to the Spanish, the Rīfī state reached the peak of its power. It now stretched from the eastern edge of the Rīf (where the Spanish "Silvestre line" had held throughout the withdrawals in the east) almost as far as Tetuan and beyond it to the west into the Banū Masawar, only a short distance from Tangier. Behind the Spanish defence lines, the Hawz and 'Anjara tribes had risen, threatening the vital Tangier to Tetuan road and the equally vital Ceuta to Tetuan railway. Within the Rīfī dominated area, most of those leaders who had in the past opposed bin 'Abd al-Karīm had been silenced. Al-Raisūlī had been captured and taken to the central Rīf where, close to death, he was imprisoned at Tamasind in the Banū Waryaghāl. 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu had fled to the French zone, although he would re-emerge to help the French in their invasion of the Rīf later in 1925. 'Abd al-Mālik was dead, and bin 'Abd al-Karīm had defeated any possible threat from Bil-Qīsh. Organised opposition to the Rīfīs in the Jibāla had been severely dealt with during January and February 1925. The only remaining focus of opposition was that provided by 'Abd al-Rahmān al-Darqāwī in the Banū Zarwāl. For this reason it was vital for the Rīfīs to take the Banū Zarwāl and the other tribes on the north bank of the Wādī Wargha. There were other reasons as well, of course, principally that the Rīf relied on the food resources of the Wargha valley. However, action in that area would undoubtedly bring the Rīfīs into conflict with the French once again.

Bin 'Abd al-Karīm was therefore very careful about his preparations for an attack which would lead to war with the French. He first had to make absolutely sure of his control of the territory that he already held, and undertook the consolidation of the Jibāla, building roads and setting up command posts and maḥakmas in the tribes--all connected by telephone, of course--and strengthening even further his political control of the area. However, the economic conditions in the Rīf and Jibāla were getting steadily worse, so the urgency of securing the upper Wargha valley was great.

Initially, the Rīfī attacks on the Wargha and the French posts north of that river were extremely successful. They were so successful, in fact, that Rīfī troops crossed the river, and after advances on other sectors of the front, for a short time threatened Fez itself. However, this led to a hasty alliance between the French and Spanish forces in Morocco, which resulted in a Spanish landing at Alhucemas in September 1925.

The military aspects of the campaign against the French zone will not be discussed in this chapter at great length, for it was the economic difficulties and the political situation in the Rīf and Jibāla which led to the attack on the French zone, and which also caused stirrings of political opposition to bin 'Abd al-Karīm within the Rifi state.

The Economy of the Jibāla, February to April 1925

The Jibāla that the Rifis took over in December 1924 and January 1925 fell rapidly into economic chaos. Al-Raisūlī had been able to point to the defeat of the Spanish and the closure of markets in the Jibāla as one of the reasons why the Akhmāsīs should oppose the Rifis.¹ He certainly had a strong argument, for, in the month between 12 December 1924 (when prices had already been reported as rising) and 11 January 1925, the price of sugar went up from 8 pts to 10 pts (a rise of 25%) and candles from 3 pts to 5 pts a packet (a 66% rise).²

At first, the Rifis were able to smuggle in large amounts of supplies from Tangier, going through the Spanish defence line at night.³ In February 1924, Vincent Sheean, the American newspaper correspondent, met a group of more than one hundred Spanish soldiers who had been taken prisoner in the 'Anjara in December, behind the Spanish lines, and who, in February, were escorted by night through the defence lines to captivity in the Rif without a shot being fired; Sheean himself crossed the Spanish lines from al-Ramla in the Banū Masawar by night, along with some four hundred men, women and children, "with their mules, donkeys, goats and chickens", on their way to the Thursday market in the International Zone, and although the Spanish posts fired on the convoy, they did it very little damage.¹

¹ See above, p. 704.

² SHM Ceuta Leg. 25, Política Diciembre, nota, 12 Dec. 1924, and Política Enero, nota, 11 Jan. 1925. The prices for December are given in the report in Ḥassanī pesetas and those for January in Spanish pesetas. The December figures have therefore been converted into Spanish pesetas. For an account of exchange rates, see above, p. xix.

³ SHM Ceuta Leg. 25, Política Febrero, nota, 19 Feb. 1925

The worst hunger was in Rifi controlled areas behind the Spanish defence lines--in the 'Anjara, Hawz and Wādī Ra's tribes. Towards the end of February, the notables of the 'Anjara and Wādī Ra's wrote to bin 'Abd al-Karīm telling him that unless he helped them they would have to take action on their own account, because of the very great misery in the tribe.² This was quite clearly a veiled threat that they would submit to the Spanish. What they needed was military support, for starting from 4 January, Spanish troops led by Francisco Franco (then still a Colonel) had begun to move up the border between the International Zone and the 'Anjara lands, and after considerable fighting they reached the coast at the end of January.³ The Spanish, however, were unable to fight their way along the coast to al-Qaṣr al-Ṣaghīr, which was only reoccupied in a sea-borne landing at the end of March.⁴

This Spanish advance between the 'Anjara and the International Zone of course made the tribes' supply problem that much more difficult. The Rifis sent 300 men to the 'Anjar and Hawz in mid-March, although Spanish Intelligence estimated that this was to keep them loyal to the Rifis and prevent them from submitting to the Spanish rather than to

¹ Sheean, Adventures, pp. 324-325, 337-343.

² SHM Ceuta Leg. 125, Política Febrero, nota, 22 Feb. 1925, 1st Report.

³ The Times, 5 Jan. 1925, p. 12, dated Madrid, 4 Jan. 1925, and 23 Jan. 1925, p. 12, dated Tangier, 22 Jan. 1925.

⁴ Ibid., 31 Mar. 1925, p. 15, dated Madrid, 30 Mar. 1925.

help them open supply routes.¹

Meanwhile, the scarcity of food in these two tribes got worse. At the beginning of March they were reported to have no grain at all.² An indication of how serious the position was came the following month when a Spanish intelligence report of 2 April stated that a man from the Hawz, one 'Abd al-Qādir, had sold his rifle to get money to buy food.³ On 6 April, when Spanish troops had reoccupied parts of the 'Anjara tribe around al-Qaṣr al-Ṣaghīr, they found that the local people were eager to eat the leftovers of the rations of Spanish troops, and the bits of bread dropped by those troops.⁴ In the rest of 'Anjara, the parts not occupied by the Spanish, persistent bombing by Spanish aeroplanes meant that the markets could not be held.⁵

Matters were not much better in the Jibāla in front of the Spanish lines. "Great misery" was reported in the Banū Masawar, and many Jibālīs left to seek work, or at least food, in Tangier, or the Spanish occupied towns of Asīla, Larache, and Alcazarquivir.⁶ The Akhmās and Banū Aḥmad were equally afflicted, and when Akhrīrū asked for their help to "punish" the 'Anjara for their threats to submit to the Spanish, they refused, saying that that tribe was too far away, and that anyway they were too hungry to move.⁷ The situation was not helped by the actions of the Rifīs themselves, who

¹ SHM Ceuta Leg. 25, Política Marzo, nota, 13 Mar. 1925, 2nd report.

² Ibid., 6 Mar. 1925, 2nd report.

³ SHM Ceuta Leg. 25, Política April, nota, 2 Apr. 1925.

⁴ Ibid., nota, 6 Apr. 1925.

⁵ Ibid., nota, 14 Apr. 1925, 2nd report.

⁶ Ibid.

⁷ Ibid., nota, 15 Apr. 1925.

were reported to be taking food supplies--peas and beans-- from Shāwin to Ajdīr as "war booty".¹

The refugees pouring into Tangier to find food became a matter of international concern, and in April, Prince 'Umar Tussūn, a cousin of the King of Egypt, issued an appeal to the Muslim world for help for the "Rīfī" homeless, and started the fund with a personal gift of five hundred Egyptian pounds.² The Nizam of Hyderabad contributed another £500 sterling in May.³

Not surprisingly, these conditions caused considerable ill-will towards the Rīfīs in the Jibāla, but there was little that the local people could do about it, for Rīfī control of the area was too strong.

The Rīfī Administration of the Jibāla

After the burning of the Akhmās and the capture of al-Raisūlī, the ḥarka that had supported al-Raisūlī in Tazarūt disintegrated.⁴ Now the Rīfīs could set about organising the Jibāla in accordance with their wishes.

Their first step, at the end of February, was to call the notables of the Jibāla to a meeting in Ajdīr. At this meeting, qā'ids and other officials were appointed.⁵ Bin 'Abd al-Karīm told his audience that they should defend their country (waṭan) against anyone who tried to take it:

"Spain is the bitter enemy of [our] religion, and has no other intention than the abolition of Islam in the Rīf, and in any other tribes she occupies, and she will spare no effort to eliminate it in

¹ Ibid., nota, 9 Apr. 1925.

² The Times, 29 Apr. 1925, p. 15.

³ Ibid., 27 May, 1925, p. 15.

⁴ SHM Ceuta Leg. 25, Política Febrero, nota, 19 Feb. 1925.

⁵ Skīraj, op. cit., p. 139.

in any form . . ."¹

This was presumably in the cause of a general encouragement, for bin 'Abd al-Karīm then moved on to more practical aspects of administration. He appointed Sī Ḥaddu b. 'Alī al-Muḡaddim, of Ajdīr (Ra'īs Misa'ūd "Sibara's" successor as Minister of Marine) as a temporary inspector, based at Shāwin, to set up telephone lines and an organisation, and to coordinate attacks on Ceuta and Tetuan² (see Photograph XII:1). They were then told that each tribe should choose a place to put a maḡakma suitable for the administrator of the tribe and his helper, that they should make a census of all the arms in the tribe and store them at the maḡakma so that when an idāla left to join the ḡarka, all its members would be armed. This last instruction apparently infuriated the Jibālīs as they considered, quite correctly, that it was an attempt to disarm the tribe.³

When Akhrīrū returned from Ajdīr and, on 27 February, announced these decisions at Taghzūt, the local people were angry, and told him that they would not hand over their arms, that they would not allow the appointment of administrators, and that they would prefer to submit to the Spanish or the French. Once again the belief that by ejecting the Spanish the Jibālīs could return to living as autonomous tribes and clans, as they had before the Spanish arrived, was being expressed. They had seen the Rifīs as liberators, but only now realised that they had been forcibly incorporated into the new state. . . They may not have liked

¹ Skīraj, op. cit., pp. 139-140.

² Ibid., p. 140.

³ SHM Ceuta Leg. 25, Política Marzo, nota, 2 Mar. 1925.

⁴ Ibid., nota, 5 Mar. 1925.

Photograph XII: 1

A European traveller's drawing of a meeting of Rifi officials in a house in the Wādī Lāw area in late 1924 or early 1925. Notice the man in the right foreground speaking into a telephone mouthpiece.

Source: Illustrated London News, 21 February
1925, p. 281.

this, but there was very little they could do about it, for the Rifis were quite definitely in control. At the beginning of March, bin 'Abd al-Karīm ordered the Banū Idhīr to pay a fine of (reportedly) 50,000 pesetas, an enormous sum in the straitened economic difficulties of the tribe, because of five Rifis who had been killed in the tribe. When they refused, a large harka was sent from the Hawz, and arrived on 4 March, in order to enforce payment.¹

Generally speaking, the attitude of the Jibālīs seems to have been a begrudging acquiescence to Rifi domination. Sheean, on his journey out of the Rif through the Jibāla in February 1925, noted that when he spent a night in a village of the Banū 'Arūs:

"I could see what had never appeared before in the whole journey across northern Morocco: a latent hostility, or at best an unwilling friendship, for the Sultan Mohammed ben Abd al-Krim . . . They were not unfriendly [towards Sheean, and his Rifi companion], but they smiled slightly each time Mohammed and I referred to the Rifi leader as the 'Sultan'."²

Some people did feel able to protest about some aspects of Rifi rule. A meeting at Mūlāy 'Abd al-Salām in the second week of March agreed to wage total war against the Christians, but also to write to bin 'Abd al-Karīm complaining about the behaviour of the Rifi troops.³ It will be remembered that stories, true or otherwise, about Rifis abusing Jibālī women, had spread before the Akhmās uprising in January. One man, a former qādī in Tetuan, and well-disposed towards the Spanish, made his own individual protest. When Rifi soldiers started drilling in the main square of Shāwin, he nailed up all the windows of his house looking over the square. For this insolence he was fined 5,000 pesetas.¹

¹ Ibid.

² Sheean, Adventures, pp. 320-321.

³ SHM Ceuta Leg. 25, Política Marzo, nota, 13 Mar. 1925, 1st report.

In fact, those Jibālīs who disliked the Rifīs could only content themselves with such gestures, for they could take no effective action at all. On 28 March, Spanish Intelligence reported that the Akhmās had been completely disarmed,² and on 4 April, it reported that all the Ghumāran tribes had been disarmed as well. Qā'id Wuld al-Qurfa then proceeded to deal with the Banū Sa'id al-Gharb in the same way.³ At the end of April, information came from the Larache Comandancia that Rifi agents were counting up arms in the Banū Sikkar.⁴

Once again, bin 'Abd al-Karīm's policies were serving a variety of ends at once. By disarming the tribes he could claim, firstly, that it prevented feuding, and secondly, that it ensured that the harkas were adequately armed. It also ensured his own continued dominance over the Jibāla.

In fact, the only place where that dominance was even slightly questioned was in the 'Anjara. Cut off from direct Rifi control, behind the Spanish lines, and hungry as well, the people of the 'Anjara showed a marked tendency to submit to the Spanish. However, the presence of sympathetic tribes behind the Spanish defence lines was obviously of great strategic importance for the Rifīs; and a concerted propaganda effort was made to keep the 'Anjara opposed to the Spanish. One letter, sent by a Rifi agent in mid-March

¹ Ibid., nota, 27 Mar. 1925, 1st report.

² Ibid., nota, 28 Mar. 1925.

³ SHM Ceuta Leg. 25, Política Abril, nota, 4 Apr. 1925.

⁴ Ibid., nota, 24 Apr. 1925.

1925 to four people in the valley of the Wādī al-Mārsa, in the eastern 'Anjara, not far from Ceuta, ran as follows:

(After the traditional greetings) "Know that all the Muslims of the zone, from the Muluya as far as your country, are agreed and united under a lord sent by God, an excellent person, who has great powers and facilities to fight and expel our enemies. We shall rejoice that you listen to the voice of God and come to join the rest of your brothers. From them you will hear the plans for the triumphs of the Muyahidin [sic]. If you do not heed the call you will suffer the same fate as the Xerif Raisuni [sic] who lost everything: freedom, goods and money which has fallen into the coffers of our Mahzen [sic], and his children have been arrested. Be as quick as you can and at once decide to join your brothers."¹

This is a fairly primitive bit of propaganda--a mixture of appeal for jihād and threats, but it contains a passing reference to the new character of the Rifi state, pointing to the facilities which the "lord sent by God" enjoyed in his battle against the Spanish. Bin 'Abd al-Karim was also quite willing to try to carry out the threats implicit in his agent's letter, for on 23 March he wrote to the 'Anjara that there were people in the village of 'Azib bin al-'Aishish in the far west of the tribe, near the border with the International Zone, who were disloyal. They were to be arrested and sent to Ajdir.²

Whether these people were in fact arrested and sent to Ajdir is not known but it does not seem to have stopped people in the 'Anjara from submitting to the Spanish. On 5 April, ten villages in the east of the tribe submitted to the Spanish, partly in their desperation to get food.³

¹ SHM Ceuta Leg. 25, Política Marzo, nota, 20 Mar. 1925, 1st report, containing letter (translated into Spanish) of letter from Mohamed Ben Mohamed el Muyahed Mesrandi to Sidi Enfed-del Cheraid, Taleb Sidi Enfed-del el-Kamel, Sidi el Hach Mohamed Kanya y Sidi el-Hossain-Ben Yiaa, dated 1343.

² Ibid., nota, 23 Mar. 1925, 1st report.

³ SHM Ceuta Leg. 25, Política Abril, nota, 6 Apr. 1925.

The 'Anjara apart, bin 'Abd al-Karīm's control of the main part of the Jibāla was absolute. There were guard posts in all the tribes and at places like the zawiya of Sidi Yusif of Tīlīdī.¹ In each village, according to Spanish Intelligence, five men and five women were paid by the Rifis to report anyone who spoke ill of the Rifis or of bin 'Abd al-Karīm--or indeed spoke of him at all, for a rumour had spread that no one had seen him for four months, with the implication that he was dead. Anyone who was unwise enough to comment on this rumour was liable to suffer the death penalty, the market-criers announced.²

The same penalty--death--was announced for anyone who discussed the death of al-Raisūlī,³ who had died at Tamasind on 3 Apr. 1925.⁴ The same prohibition applied in the Rif as well--only there the penalty was a very heavy fine.⁵ It is an extraordinarily vivid illustration of the extent to which bin 'Abd al-Karīm controlled the Rif and the Jibāla, that the first rumours of al-Raisūlī's death did not reach Tangier until 17 April,⁶ and that even on 26 April, the Spanish authorities at Alhucemas Island could not decide whether the rumour was true.⁷

Certainly bin 'Abd al-Karīm held the Rif under the same tight control as he did the Jibāla. There is an account of a visit by a Moroccan agent of the French in January and February 1925 which shows this very clearly.

¹ Ibid., nota, 20 Apr. 1925.

² Ibid.

³ Ibid., nota, 23 Apr. 1925.

⁴ Hart, Aith Waryaghar, p. 393.

⁵ SHM Melilla Leg. 28, Información Matalsa, nota, 26 Apr. 1925.

⁶ The Times, 18 Apr. 1925, p. 10, dated Madrid, 17 Apr. 1925.

⁷ SHM Melilla Leg. 28, Información Matalsa, nota, 26 Apr. 1925.

The Visit of 'Alī al-Majāwī b. Mukhtār to the Rīf

On 8 February 1925, 'Alī al-Majāwī b. al-Mukhtār, a man from one of the unsubmitted tribes of the Banū Warrayn, came voluntarily to the French post at Berkine in the foothills of the Middle Atlas (on the edge of the Banū Warrayn confederation) to offer information about a trip he had just made into the Rīf.¹ His aim in providing this information, according to the French, was firstly to earn a little money, and secondly to obtain a pardon for various unspecified crimes that he had committed between 1920 and 1923. The French considered him a reliable informant.

In order to enter the Rīf, he was able to use a safe-conduct pass signed by bin 'Abd al-Karīm which he had obtained in 1923 when he had acted as a messenger between bin 'Abd al-Karīm and leaders of the Banū Warrayn. On this occasion, armed with his old safe-conduct documents, he went to the Rīf with the excuse of looking for a Warraynī leader who had gone to the Rīf on a visit and not yet returned.

He entered the Rīf from the south, crossing the Fez-Taza railway line near Masūn on 13 January. The following day he reached the first Rīfī outpost at Bū Ma'wiyat near Sakka. There he found a Waryaghli qā'id, another Waryaghli "notable", and five members of the Rīfī regular army. They also had a telephone, connecting their position with Sī 'Alī Bū 'Uqba and, eventually, Ajdīr. The qā'id explained that the purpose of the maḥakma at Sakka was principally to keep a watch on the French, and to open negotiations with people in the French half of the Banū Bū Yaḥyī, who were encouraged to come to markets in the Rif and were welcomed by the Rifis. 'Alī al-Majāwī was also informed that while bin 'Abd al-Karīm had made it quite clear that at that point, in January 1925, he did not want war with the French, he was making preparations for an attack on the French zone with the assistance of a certain Sī Khalīl b. Mūlāy Muḥammad, a man who claimed, somewhat curiously, to be the son of Bū Ḥimāra (the pretender to the Moroccan throne between 1902 and 1903, who had been based for some time at Silwān, near Melilla).¹ Sī Khalīl had taken part in the first conflicts with the French in the Banū Warrayn in 1922, and had joined the Rifis in 1923, for whom he had undertaken to organise all the refugees from the French zone. 'Alī al-Majāwī picked up the rumour that Khalīl expected to receive Rifī help for an attack on the French zone in March or April 1925--a rumour of some significance in view of the Rifī attack on the French zone in April. The Sakka front was protected by a group of some 400 Rifī regulars, who spent their days training, and building air raid shelters.

¹ SHAT Maroc Fez 156, Territoire de Taza, Cercle de Guercif, Annexe de Mahiridga, Bureau de Berkine. Services de Renseignements, no. 21. "Renseignements fournis sur le Riff", Berkine, 8 Feb. 1925, Confidentiel (henceforward referred to as "Renseignements fournis sur le Riff").

On 16 January, 'Alī al-Majāwī visited the Friday market at 'Ain Zuhra, and noted the political calls made by the local Maṭālsī qā'ids for the Banū Bū Yaḥyī of the French zone to come to the Rif for trade--presumably part of the political campaign to "attract" that tribe. It is interesting to note that in making use of the markets, bin 'Abd al-Karīm was adopting precisely the same methods of "attracting" to his cause the French part of the Banū Bū

¹ See above, p. 30.

Yaḥyī as the Spanish had used in 1916 for the part of the same tribe that fell inside their zone.¹

'Alī al-Majāwī visited a number of markets during his rather leisurely approach to Ajdīr, and at each he noted propaganda being made and calls for ḥarkas against the French and the Spanish. It is difficult to say whether or not it was a coincidence, but in the markets close to the "Christian lines" at Sī 'Alī Bū 'Uqba, and Sūq al-Ithnayn of the Banū Tūzīn, the market announcements that he reported were concerned with the organisation of ḥarkas, and it was not until he reached Sūq al-Arba'a of the Banū Waryaghāl that he reported religious and social propaganda. Here, on 21 January, he heard Sī Yazīd b. Ḥammu, the Minister of the Interior, who:

" . . . told the natives to observe the religious laws scrupulously, so that they would always have God's protection; that Ould Abd al-Krim required everyone to live in peace and that he forbade any disorder; that he would be very severe towards anyone who committed an offence, that those who killed would be killed, that anyone who stole would have his right hand cut off."²

This last announcement is of particular interest, for it is the only mention of such a penalty being enforced. If it is correct--and there seems no reason why 'Alī al-Majāwī should make it up--it shows yet another advance of the sharī'a into Rīfī society and one, moreover, in a form which had largely died out in Morocco before 1900.³

The following day he went to a Thursday market near Ajdīr, at which Aḥmad Bū Drā, the Minister of War, made a speech announcing the capture of Tazarūt, and giving the credit for this to Akhrīrū. The very fact that he emphasised Akhrīrū's part in al-Raisūlī's capture is significant, for it points to a concern to bring home the unity of the Rif and the Jibāla to his audience.

¹ See above, pp. 163-164.

² "Renseignements fournis sur le Riff".

³ See above, p. 128.

Next, 'Alī al-Majāwī went to Ajdīr. He found that bin 'Abd al-Karīm had moved his headquarters to Azghār, about a kilometre from Ajdīr, and the maḥakma of Ajdīr had largely been taken over by Sī Khalīl b. Mūlāy Muḥammad and his group of supporters from the French zone. In order to stay in Ajdīr, he had to obtain written permission from the maḥakma, since anyone who did not have this authorisation was expelled from the area. Again, this implies a considerable level of social and bureaucratic control. This is not to say that the maḥakma itself was particularly opulent, for it was no more than a house of the traditional type for the area (see Photograph XII: 2).

'Alī al-Majāwī received his permission easily enough on production of his safe-conduct pass, and spent the week-end of 24-26 January in Ajdīr, making frequent visits to Azghār. The level of activity in the area seems quite remarkable. Some of the Spanish prisoners (between 80 and 100 of them) were employed in digging trenches and air raid shelters; others were employed in making cartridges; yet others in making leather gas-masks. Numerous Jews were employed in making hand-grenades out of old fruit tins, and other Europeans were involved in maintaining the telephone service.

On Tuesday 27 January, 'Alī entered the maḥakma of Azghār to ask for an interview with bin 'Abd al-Karīm. He saw the office, with a telephone, of Aḥmad Bū Drā, and that of

Photograph XII: 2

The maḥakma of Ajdīr, bin 'Abd al-Karīm's former house, after its capture by the Spanish in the autumn of 1925.

Source: Illustrated London News, 24 October 1925, p. 803.

SI Aḥmad Shiddī, who he describes as mutaṣarrif in charge of making payments to the army and recording taxes and fines.¹ Both these offices, and that of bin 'Abd al-Karīm, were furnished simply, in the European manner. 'Alī al-Majāwī was then interrogated by Aḥmad Bū Drā, in the presence of bin 'Abd al-Karīm, about the political situation in the Banū Warrayn, and his replies were carefully noted down by a secretary. He was then dismissed and told to wait for a further interview.

That interview never came, although he was interrogated again by Sī Khalīl about the political position in the Banū Warrayn. After a week, 'Alī al-Majāwī decided to leave Ajdīr: "I was fed up because life is expensive there and nobody gives you anything."² However, to do so, he had to get another permit, this time to leave Ajdīr. He applied on the morning of 2 February to the maḥakma of Azghār, and in true Moroccan fashion was told to come back in the afternoon. Finally, Aḥmad Bū Drā gave him permission to return home and he set off at once, along the Shāwin road, and through the Ghumāra. However, by this time he had run out of money and decided to return home without visiting Shāwin, as he had intended. He went through the Banū 'Amārt, and the Gaznaya, where he saw extensive defence works being carried out on the French front. There were large numbers of Rifi troops--about 1,400 near Kiffān, ready to attack the French zone. The local commanders were apparently most anxious to do this, but bin 'Abd al-Karīm had forbidden any such attack because "the hour had not yet struck".¹ Eventually he regained the French lines and made his report.

¹ "Renseignements fournis sur le Riff". According to Hart, Aith Waryaghar, pp. 378-379, Shiddī was only an assistant to Sī Muḥammad Bū Jibār, who was chief mutaṣarrif.

² "Renseignements fournis sur le Riff".

Four things stand out clearly in this report. Firstly, the very great level of organisation that 'Alī al-Majāwī describes. He makes numerous references to the telephone system, to the bureaucracy, and social control in Ajdīr. Secondly, he gives considerable insight into the authority of the Rifī state. His safe-conduct pass was valid everywhere. Quite clearly, also, bin 'Abd al-Karīm was in full control of his officers and officials on the French front, despite their desires to invade the zone at once. Thirdly, he gives proof that bin 'Abd al-Karīm was under political pressure to attack the French and was preparing for eventual war against them. Finally, he comments upon the economic difficulties in Ajdīr, and indeed on the French front, where the troops seemed to him "to be very underfed."

He sums up his own opinions thus:

"From the conversations I had, I received the impression that Abd el-Krim [sic] has considerably increased his prestige since my trip in 1923, but that the necessities of life are very difficult to find. Many of the tribes are tired of sending contingents, but no one dares to protest out loud. Ould Abd el-Krim says that he does not want to attack the French because he cannot wage war on two fronts, but he is fundamentally hostile to the French, and I believe that he is ready to encourage Si el-Khellil Ould Moulay M'Ahmed [sic] in his enterprise."²

The attack on the French zone, the next major stage of the Rif war, did not come until April 1925 but it was to be well planned and prepared in advance.

¹ Ibid.

² Ibid.

The Attack on the French Zone

Military preparations for the attack on the French zone were well under way at the beginning of February 1925. In fact, despite the defeats of the summer of 1924, bin 'Abd al-Karīm had never given up his intention of dealing with 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Darqāwī. After the conference at which he had announced the arrangements for administering the Jibāla, held in Ajdīr at the end of January, bin 'Abd al-Karīm called another meeting of his qā'ids with representatives from the Ghumāra and Sinhāja and announced that apart from the necessity of dealing with Spain, and ejecting her from Ceuta and Tetuan; he also intended to defeat 'Abd al-Raḥmān "because he has caused trouble between us and the rulers of the French zone." 'Abd al-Raḥmān, he said, clearly wanted the French to take over the Banū Zarwāl, and it would therefore be better if the Rifis invaded that tribe first. Not surprisingly, everyone agreed with this view.¹

It is interesting that at this stage bin 'Abd al-Karīm continued to imply that he did not intend to attack the French zone as such, but only to occupy those parts of the "Rif" that still did not obey him. Nevertheless, he himself must have been well aware that such moves would lead to war with the French and he made his preparations accordingly.

His military command² was also aware of it and

¹ Skīraj, op. cit., pp. 40-41.

² This consisted of bin 'Abd al-Karīm, his brother Sī Maḥammad, 'Abd al-Salām al-Khaṭṭābī, Aḥmad Bū Drā, Yazīd b. al-Ḥājǰ Ḥammu, Muḥammad Bū Jibār, Bū Laḥya, Ḥammādī al-Shams, and Sī 'Umar b. Muḥammādī (of the Banū 'Abdallah). According to al-Bū 'Ayyāshī, it also included the latter's father 'Abd al-Salām b. al-Ḥājǰ Muḥand who seems to have reverted to obedience to bin 'Abd al-Karīm in July and August 1925. Al-Bū 'Ayyāshī, op. cit., vol. II, p. 348.

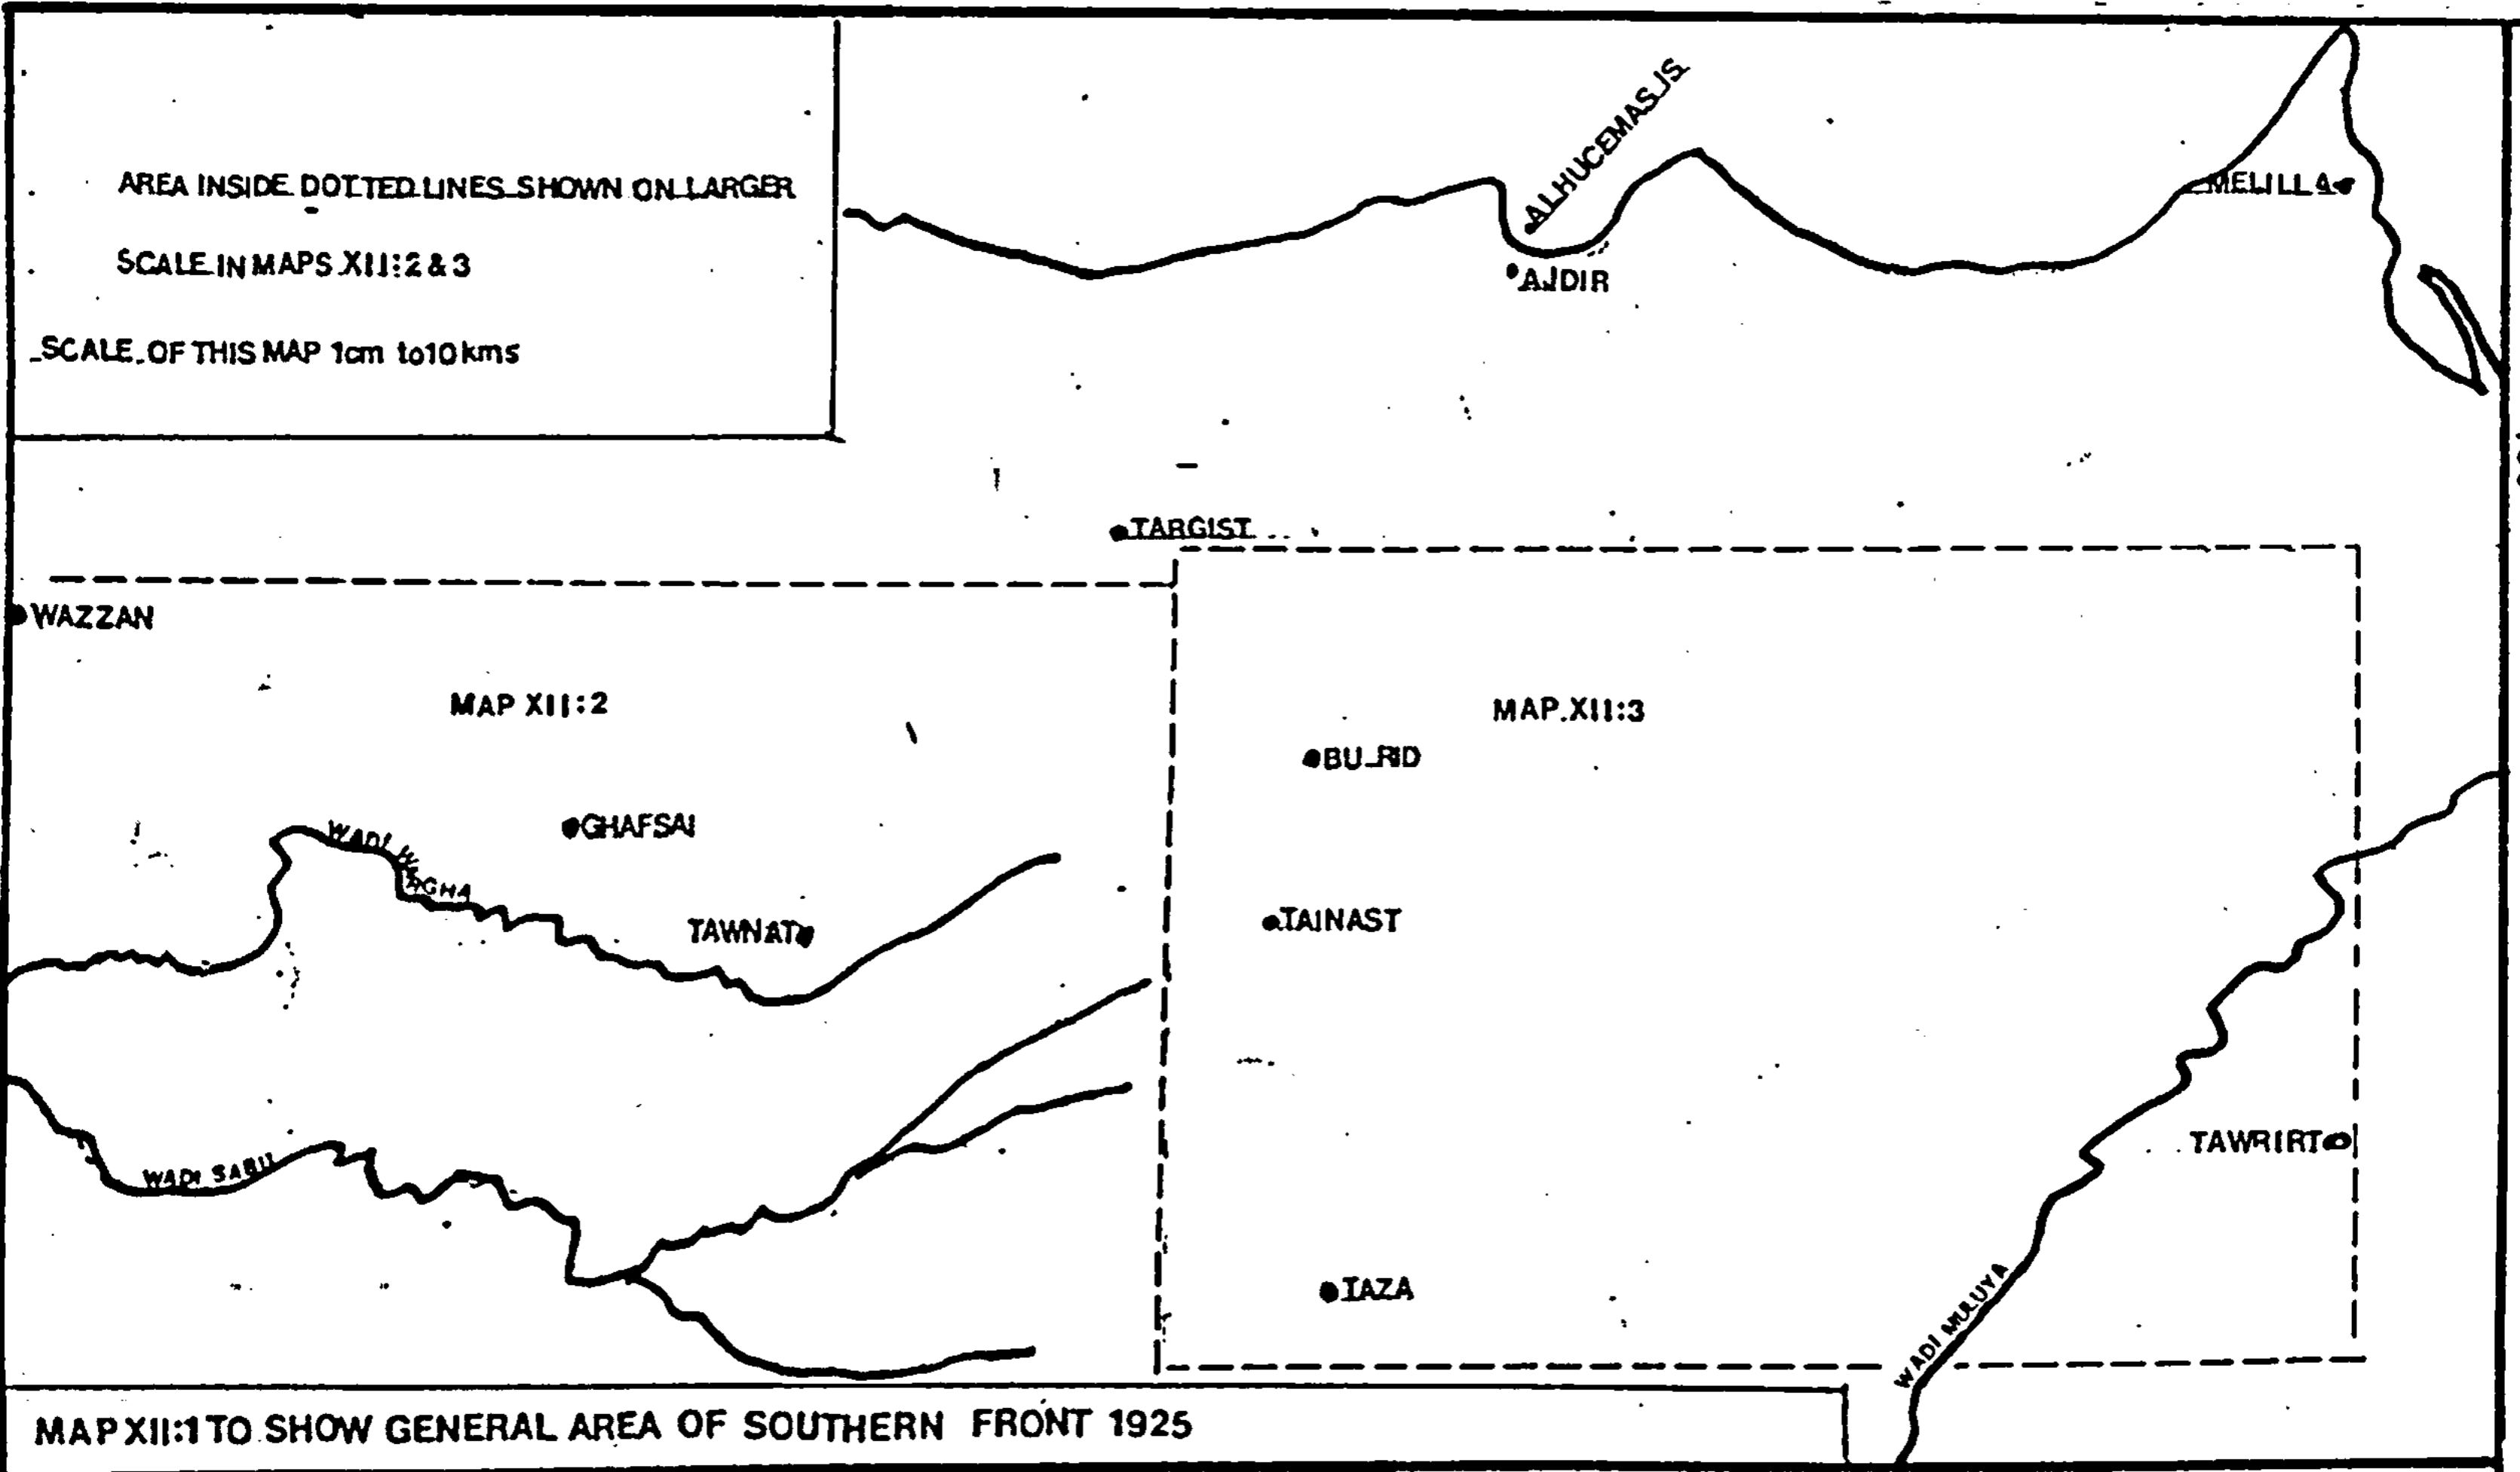

it agreed to undertake military action against the French. A special General Staff was formed for the occasion, under Sī Maḥammad al-Khaṭṭābī, consisting mainly of people from the Spanish occupied territories in the eastern zone. It included Idrīs b. Mimūn Khujja, a Qal'ayī who had served with bin 'Abd al-Karīm since 1921, Qā'id Bū Raḥayl of the al-Maṭālsa, Qā'id 'Amar b. Bū 'Azzā of the Spanish occupied part of the Banū Sa'id al-Rīf, a qā'id from the Banū Bū Yaḥyī, a Sīdī al-Ḥassan al-Qadirī al-Tilimsānī from Algeria, who was secretary to the General Staff, and three Rīfis: 'Allāl b. al-Ḥājj bū 'Azzā of the Timsamān, Muḥammad Sharrat of Ajdir, who was to be chef de cabinet, and Aḥmad b. Sī Sha'ib Aqī'ān who was to be paymaster. Together these men moved to Targīst to begin plans for the operations.¹

As 'Alī al-Majāwī showed, part of the preparations for the advance consisted of constructing a defensive barrier on the southern side of the Rīf, behind which the Rīfis could retire if necessary. But all the troops were not finally mobilised until the beginning of March 1925 in order to preserve secrecy, and even then it was done with considerable care. The attack was scheduled to begin at the beginning of April, just as al-Majāwī had predicted, with a group of Rīfī regular army moving into the Banū Zarwāl through the Kitāma tribe, while irregular ḥarkas attacked the French posts in the upper Wargha valley.²

Troops were to be moved to all positions covering the front--to the Ghafsai area, to the Wazzān region, to the Brānis, to the Marnīsa and Gaznaya, and to near Tawnāt. The qā'ids involved included most of the Rīfis and numerous

¹ Ibid., pp. 348-349.

² Ibid., p. 359.

MAP XII:1 TO SHOW GENERAL AREA OF SOUTHERN FRONT 1925

● Wazzan

BANU MASGUILDA
● Tarwal

● Amjutt
BANU ZARWAL
● Biban

WADI WARGHA

● Mulay Bushta

● Qarya Bu Muhammad

WADI SABU

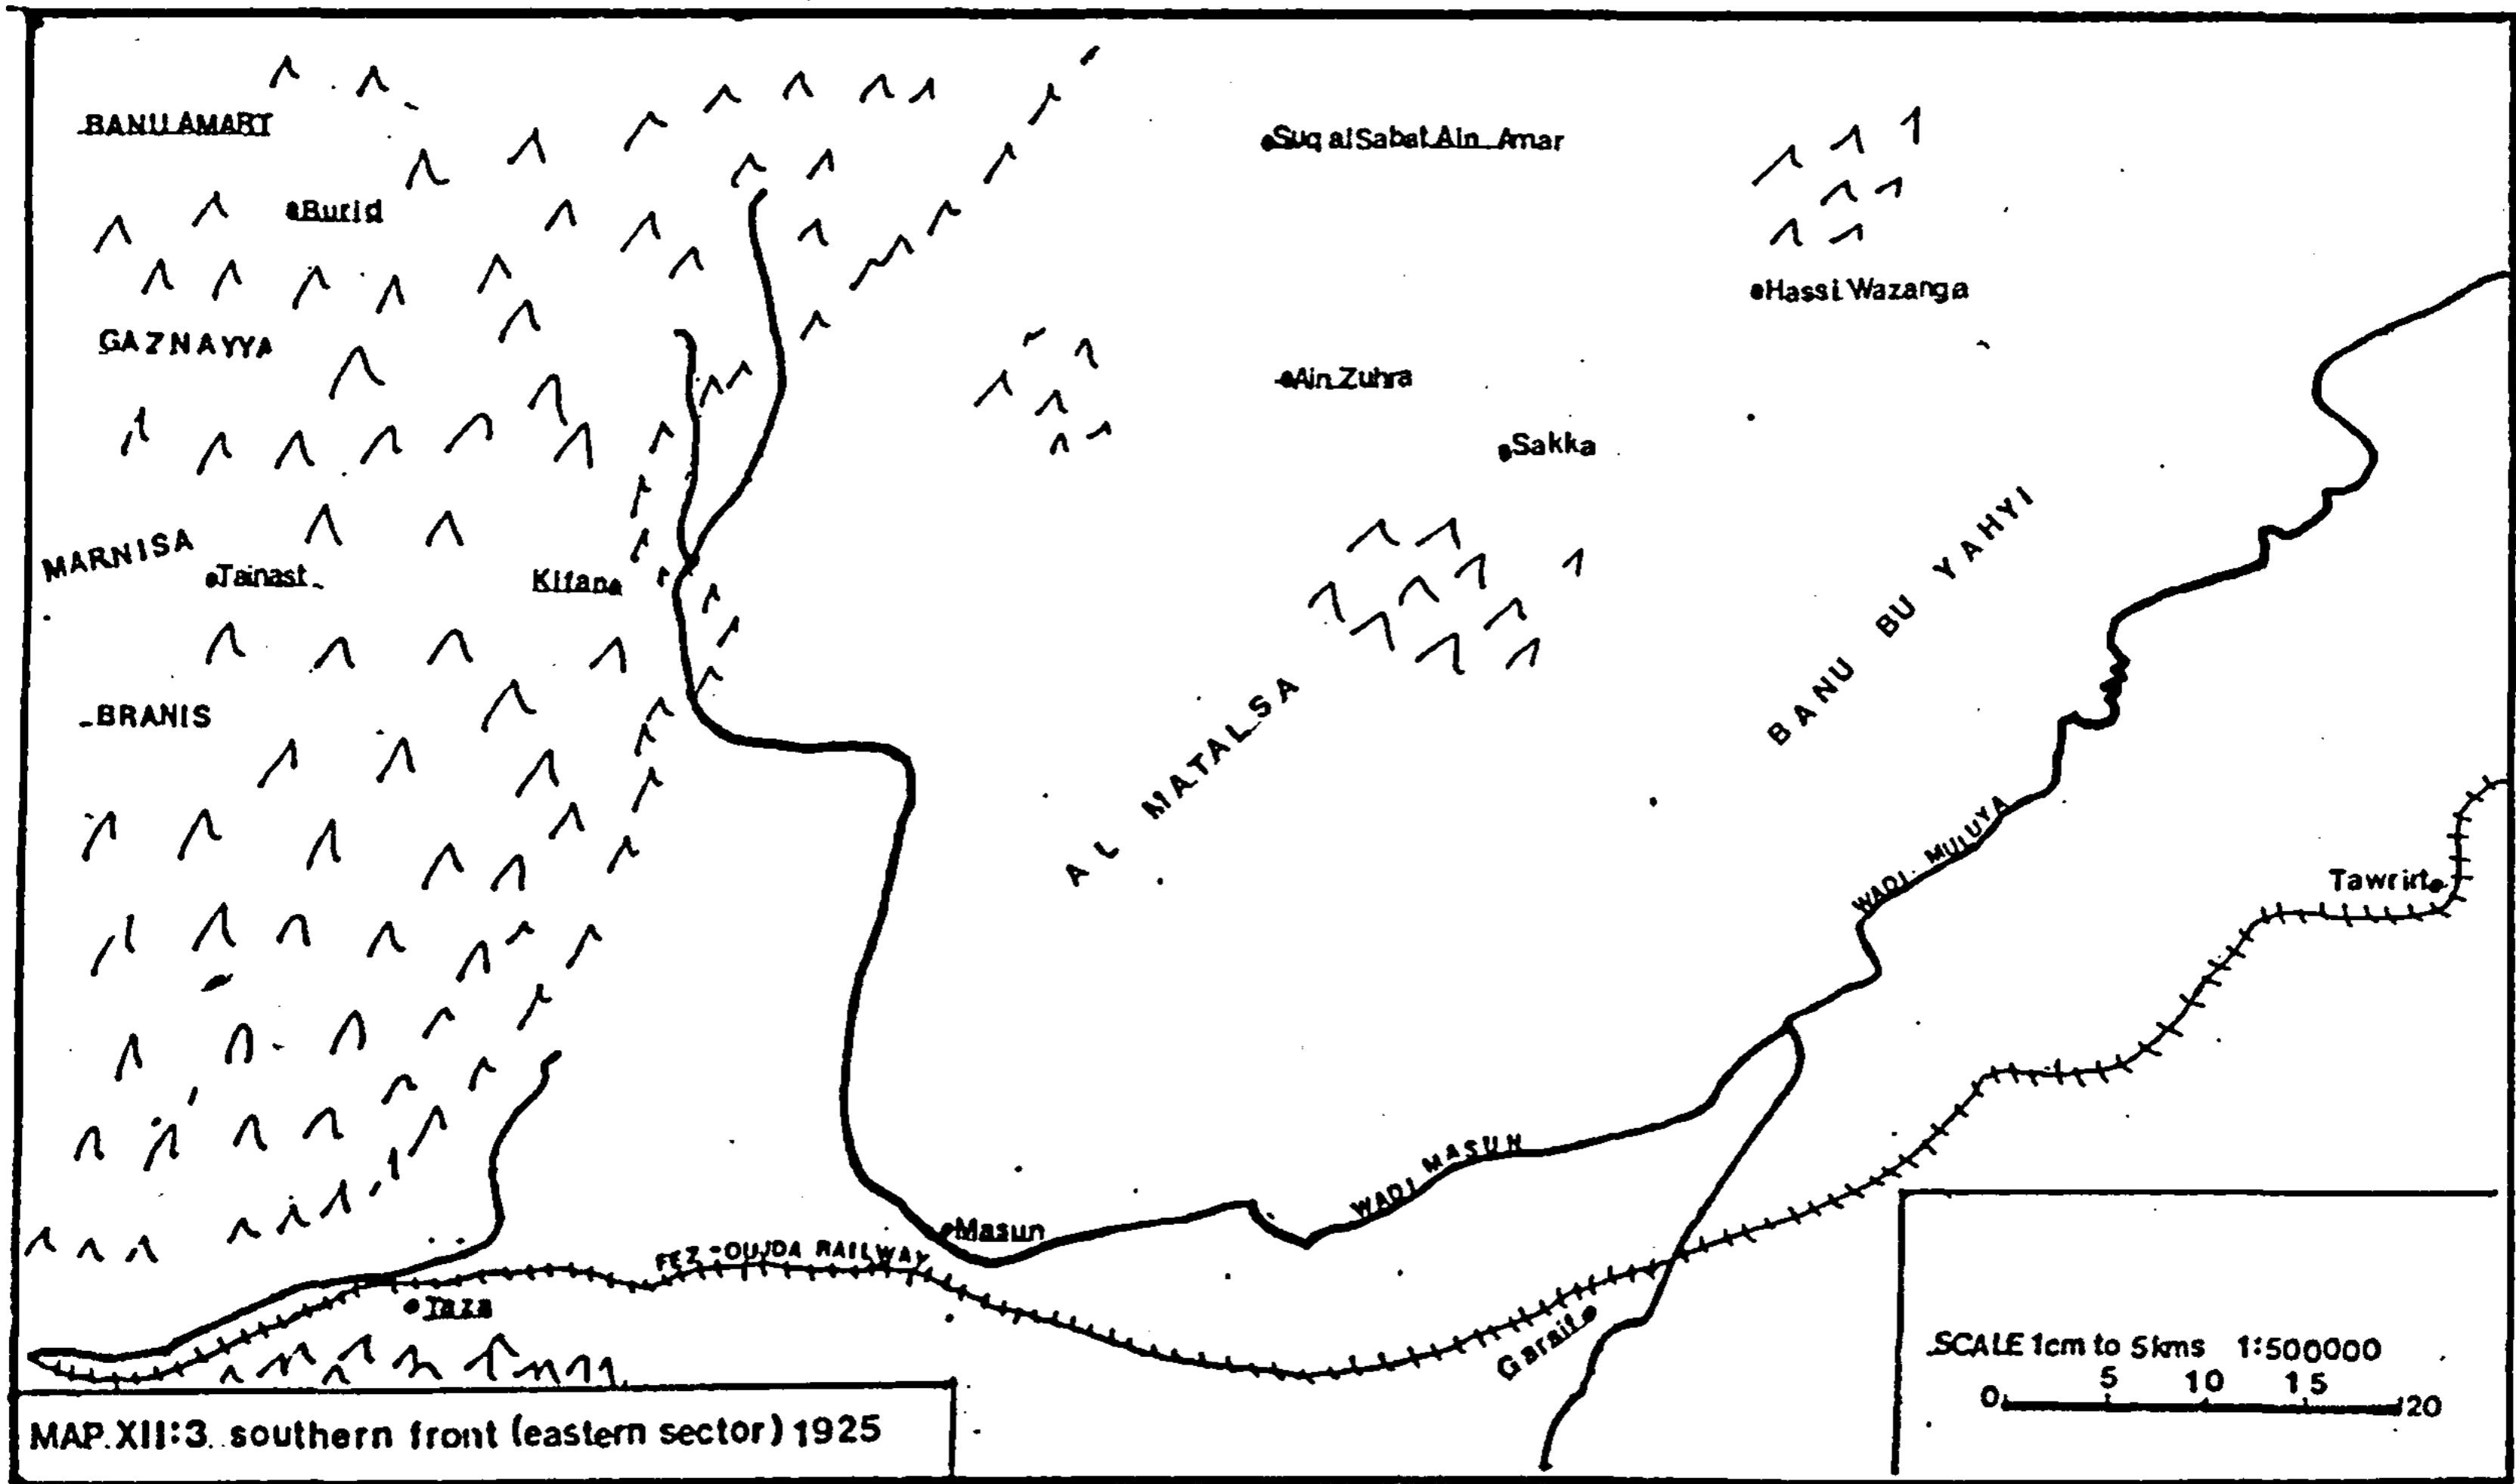

SCALE 1cm to 5kms 1:500000
0 5 10 15 20

MAP XII 2 Southern front (western sector) 1925

FEZ

537

MAP.XII:3. southern front (eastern sector) 1925

SCALE 1cm to 5kms 1:500000
 0 5 10 15 20

Ghumāri commanders--Wuld al-Qurfa, Muḥammad bin Ṣadiq of the Banū Ḥadhifa clan of the Banū Waryaghāl, even Kuyas of the Kitāma,¹ despite the past record of untrustworthiness of the latter two. The Banū Waryaghāl tribe of the northern Wargha was ordered to prepare supplies for the Rifis. On 5 March, all the Rifi staff, including Si Maḥammad, moved from Targist to the zawiya of Sidī Muḥammad b. Ṣadiq al-Akhamliṣhī in the Zarqāt, partly in order to use his religious authority to help the attack, according to al-Bū 'Ayyāshī.²

Eventually the whole command arrived at Tabarrant where the troops were harangued by an aged muqaddam from the Banū Walishak, reputedly over 100 years old, who called them to "jihād in the way of God" and warned them not to kill prisoners, and to take all the captured prisoners to the command posts.³

The date of the first attack on the French zone varies according to the different accounts of the war, although all are agreed that the first attacks were on the Banū Zarwāl. According to the most trustworthy source, that of the Banū Zarwāl themselves, the attacks came on April 12.⁴ They said that on 11 April the clans of the Banū Zarwāl received letters inviting them to submit, and the following day, before they had time to reply, they were

¹ Ibid., p. 360.

² Ibid.

³ Ibid., pp. 361-362.

⁴ Al-Bū 'Ayyāshī gives 5 Apr. 1925 (ibid., p. 360) Gabrielli 13 Apr. 1925 (op. cit., p. 60), and the Banū Zarwāl themselves told the French that the invasion came on 12 Apr. 1925. (SHAT Maroc E24, Propagande Riffaine, Letter, Lyautey to Ministre des Affaires Etrangères, Rabat, 24 Sept. 1924, enclosing Fez B. des R., Amjot, 16 Sept. 1925). The details contained in this latter account make it seem the most trustworthy.

invaded.¹ The invasion forces in this area were at first composed mainly of men from the Jibāla. Rifis only appeared when the fighting was almost over. One ḥarka, composed of men from the Banū Mastāra, moved into the centre of the tribe,² and another, commanded by Muḥammad b. 'Amar Ḥammaysh, moved directly on 'Amjūṭṭ with the aim of taking 'Abd al-Raḥmān.³ 'Abd al-Raḥmān, however, fled with his family to Fez and stayed there, under French protection, until the tribe was reoccupied by the French.⁴ The zawiya at 'Amjūṭṭ was then burned.

After only a day's fighting, the parts of the Banū Zarwāl which were not under French occupation submitted to the Rifis. The head of each ḥarka then called a meeting of the notables of the clans:

"He explained that Holy War had been proclaimed by Abd el-Krim, the true Sultan of Morocco, to throw out the infidels, and particularly the French, in the name of the greater glory of regenerated Islam. He declared that the occupation of all Morocco by the Rifis was no more than a question of days, and invited the notables to tell him what positions they wanted to occupy in the tribes and towns. A secretary wrote each man's wishes in a large register. The posts offered were all those of makhzan officials, Pachas, Caids, Cadis, Nadirs, Oumanas, Mohtassebs [sic], etc. The posts most in demand were those of Pacha, Caids and Oumanas. The registers were sent to Abd el-Krim to decide, immediately after the ceremony."⁵

Then the Rifis took 400 hostages and sent them to Ajdir, to force the Banū Zarwāl to supply troops and to pay a fine of 200,000 livestock which was imposed. As the fines were paid

¹ SHAT Maroc E24, Propagande Riffaine, Fez, B. de R., Amjot, 16 Sept. 1925.

² Ibid.

³ Ibid., and Skīraj, op. cit., p. 140.

⁴ Al-Fihri, op. cit., p. 48.

⁵ SHAT Maroc E24, Propagande Riffaine, Fez, B. de R., Amjot, 16 Sept. 1925.

the hostages were released. All the habus property in the tribe was confiscated by the Rifis.¹

The speeches by the harka leaders are interesting, for they refer to bin 'Abd al-Karīm as Sultan, not only of the Rif but of all of Morocco. He was Sultan not because of his birth but because he was the man who would lead Morocco to expel the infidels. Whether or not bin 'Abd al-Karīm had specifically approved this designation is uncertain, but it seems quite clear that in the eyes of his followers, if not of the defeated Banū Zarwāl, he was Sultan.

The attack on the French positions in the Banū Zarwāl began at once. Bibān and Banū Darqūl, two important French positions, were besieged.² Rifi forces also struck at Kiffān from the Gaznaya,³ a position on the Wādī Laban, at others near Tissa,⁴ and near Tawnāt.⁵ At first the French managed to repulse the Rifi attacks, but they soon came into contact with the previously prepared Rifi trench system, and their counter-attack came to a halt.⁶

There is not space here to describe in detail the course of the battles, in which some posts were taken and retaken several times.⁷ But at the end of May the French announced that they would evacuate most of the posts north of the Wargha,⁸ and all civilian Europeans were evacuated from Wazzān.⁹

¹ Ibid.

² Ibid.

³ The Times, 2 May 1925, p. 11, dated Paris, 1 May 1925.

⁴ Ibid., 4 May 1925, p. 14, dated Paris, 2 May 1925.

⁵ Ibid., 8 May 1925, p. 14, dated Tangier, 7 May 1925.

⁶ Ibid., 9 May 1925, p. 14, dated Paris, 8 May 1925.

⁷ For a fuller account see Woolman, op. cit., pp. 177-179.

⁸ The Times, 27 May 1925, p. 16, dated Paris, 26 May 1925.

⁹ Woolman, op. cit., pp. 177-178.

Bibān, "the gateway to Fez", fell on 5 June,¹ and although the Rifis got within 40 kilometres of the city, they did not succeed in entering it as they had promised.²

Nevertheless, bin 'Abd al-Karīm tried to win support from the 'ulamā' of Fez for his cause. On 21 June, he sent a letter to Sī Aḥmad b. Jillālī, head of the Qarāwiyīn University in Fez, to pass on to other 'ulamā'--Mūlāy 'Abd al-Malik al-Bashīr, 'Abdallah al-Bagrawī, Sī Ḥamīd Bumānī, Sī Tahāmī Gannūn, Sī al-Maḥdī al-Wazzānī and Sī Aḥmad bin al-Khiyyāt.³

The letter began:

"We tell you and your colleagues the Imams, who are men of good faith and have no relations with hypocrites and infidels, of the state of servitude into which the disunited nation of Morocco is sunk."⁴

The reason for this situation, said the letter, was that the religious leaders were incapable hypocrites, all of them, from sharīf to ṭālib. There were sharīfs who were friendly towards the infidels, there was a qāḍī who gave money to help French orphans. Mūlāy Yusif and his "perfidious entourage" had been corrupted by Christian gifts.

However, it was not just Mūlāy Yūsif who was guilty of such acts:

"We have exposed . . . the perfidy of the entourage of the Sultan Mulay El Hassan [sic] from the beginning to the end of his reign. We have pointed out each traitor by name, and made known their actions.

We have also exposed the perfidy of the entourage

¹ Ibid., p. 179. -

² Hart, Aith Waryaghar, pp. 395-396.

³ SHAT Maroc E24, Propagande Riffaine, Lyautey to Ministre des Affaires Etrangères, Rabat, 24 Aug. 1925, enclosing letter of bin 'Abd al-Karīm to Aḥmad b. Jillālī, dated 8 Dhū al-Ḥijja 1343/30 June 1925. (My translation is of the French version of the original, henceforth referred to as: SHAT Maroc E24, b. 'Abd al-Karīm to al-Jillālī.)

⁴ Ibid.

of Sultan Moulay [sic] Abd el-Aziz and pointed out each swindler individually, including those who destroyed [Moroccan] sovereignty, such as El Menebhi and others."¹

The Rughī, Bū Ḥimāra, Jillālī Zarhūnī, who had claimed the throne as Sī Maḥammad in 1909, was dismissed as "one of the sorcerers without religion", and al-Raisūlī as a schismatic. Even Mūlāy 'Abd al-Ḥafīẓ was attacked and described as:

". . . a heretic, and liar, a leader of holy war at Marrakesh, where sorcerers built for him imposing minarets, although he belonged to a family of base origins, and who, having seized great wealth, and sought refuge in Spain . . ."2

Morocco had been taken over by France, which herself had been devastated in the Great War and was now in debt to the Americans.

Mūlāy Yūsif had refused to cooperate with the Rifis so there remained only one alternative: "Power should belong to him who has the people with him in accordance with the Book of God and the Mahomedan [sic] law."³ Once again the emphasis is laid on the claim of Muḥammad bin 'Abd al-Karīm to the Sultanate as the true leader of jihād.

The leaders of Morocco had sacrificed the jihād to their personal ambition and greed, the letter continued, but this would eventually lead to their impoverishment:

"Know, oh Oulama, that if the reign of the unbelievers continues, ten Moroccans will be valued [by the Christians] at the price of one donkey, and not one will keep possession of a single dirham or dinar; nor of a forest or garden, a plot of land to sow his seed, nor a shop nor a house."⁴

There follows a series of quotations from verses of the Qur'ān, stating the necessity of jihād. It was vital that

¹ Ibid.

² Ibid.

³ Ibid.

⁴ Ibid.

no one should help the Christians for once they had overpowered Morocco completely, they would steal all its riches and destroy its leaders.¹

Once again, bin 'Abd al-Karīm was speaking the language of jihād, justifying his claim to the Sultanate because he was the only leader of Islam against the Christians. It was in many ways a traditional appeal. On the other hand, Rifi propaganda in Tangier at the same period emphasised the technological superiority which bin 'Abd al-Karīm had achieved, mainly, according to his propagandists, with German help. Germany was sending him soldiers, supplies by submarine, and "extraordinary machines to make French aeroplanes fall from the sky." Even without this help, however, he had already taken Fez--which of course was untrue--had defeated the French army completely, and had amassed war supplies with which he could carry on fighting for another two years.²

These two sorts of propaganda compensated each other, one emphasising the Islamic necessity of supporting bin 'Abd al-Karīm, the other declaring his power as leader of a modern state and army, with support from the great powers. In fact, despite the optimism of the propaganda, bin 'Abd al-Karīm had not taken Fez. Indeed, by the end of June, the French had stopped the Rifis along most of the southern front, although there were still isolated Rifi groups operating behind French lines. The French certainly could not begin to push the Rifis back yet.

¹ Ibid.

² SHAT Maroc E24, Relations du Rif avec l'étranger, Etat-Majeur de l'armée 2ème Bureau Section de Renseignements, Maroc--Propagande Riffaine à Tangier", Tunisie, 1 July 1925, Secret.

However, the Rifi advance on Fez had shown the French the necessity of cooperating with the Spanish to defeat what was now their common enemy.

The Franco-Spanish Agreement

In mid-May 1925, as the Rifi attack on the French built up, the French Prime Minister, Painlevé, sent a personal representative to Madrid to talk to the Spanish government. At first the Spanish government denied that his visit had anything to do with Morocco but on 1 June, Primo announced that French and Spanish representatives would meet later that month to try to come to an agreement over Morocco.¹

The conference began on 17 June and, one after the other, six agreements were signed. The first was on a joint patrol of coastal waters to prevent the importation of arms, the second to prevent smuggling of arms by land, and the return of "rebels" wanted by either side. The third laid down terms for a peace treaty with the Rifis. The Rifis would be granted autonomy "compatible with international treaties". In return, they would withdraw from the French zone and the Spanish would occupy Alhucemas Bay. All prisoners would be exchanged, an amnesty would be granted for all the Rifis who had "rebelled" after 1921, and a native police force would be set up to control arms and munitions.²

Primo de Rivera was desperate for this to be accepted--and be put into effect as quickly as possible, for he apparently feared that if Alhucemas was not occupied by the Spanish the French would seize on the opportunity to annex the whole of Morocco.¹ Horacio Echevarrietta, the Basque millionaire who had negotiated with bin 'Abd al-Karīm many times before, was sent to Ajdir to communicate these terms on behalf of the Spanish. As he himself expected, he got nowhere.²

¹ Fleming, op. cit., pp. 249-250.

² Ibid., p. 252.

Gabrielli, the French contrôleur at Tawrirt, also visited bin 'Abd al-Karīm at the end of June 1925. Despite bin 'Abd al-Karīm's protestations that he wanted nothing but peace with France, there was only one way to achieve this, "that France should recognise the independence of the Rif."³ In return, France would keep authority in her zone.⁴ This was in direct contrast to his own propaganda to the Fassi 'ulamā'. It seems that bin 'Abd al-Karīm was trying to get what he could behind secure and recognised frontiers. Gabrielli returned home, ostensibly to report to his superior officers on bin 'Abd al-Karīm's position.⁵ In fact, the discussions had ended and another attempt at finding a peaceful solution had failed.

Meanwhile, the conference in Madrid continued, with an agreement on the International Zone of Tangier, one on the boundary between the Protectorates, and finally, and in the end most importantly, one on the military cooperation between the two countries. The two high commands would be autonomous, but the agreement allowed the temporary occupation by one party of territory in the other's Protectorate for a

¹ Ibid., p. 259.

² Ibid. The meeting took place on 21 June 1925.

³ Gabrielli, op. cit., p. 88. This meeting took place on 28 June 1925.

⁴ Ibid., p. 89.

⁵ Ibid., p. 99.

limited period.¹ The conference ended on 25 July 1925. Meanwhile, in the Rif itself the burden of the new front was adding to the economic and political difficulties of the government.

The Economic Situation in the Rif, June to August 1925

By the third week of June 1925, the almost total mobilisation was causing a serious dislocation of society in the central Rif. There are frequent references in the reports of Spanish agents to how few men were to be seen in the countryside. For instance, the Spanish Intelligence reports from Dār Mizzyan in the Banū Walishak noted on 22 June 1925 that there were no men to be seen, for they were all in the ḥarka. There were only women and children to be found anywhere.² On 24 June, a Moroccan informant told them that in the Timsamān, "all" the men had gone to join the ḥarka in the French zone, where three-quarters of them had been killed and the rest had been wounded.³ Bin 'Abd al-Karīm was so desperately in need of troops that he had released many of the Rifi prisoners, given them guns, and sent them to fight.⁴

This situation did not improve, indeed it spread to the newly occupied territories of the Banū Zarwāl and Jibāla. At the beginning of July, French Intelligence in the Wazzān region reported that in that area there was no labour force to bring in the harvest, and crops were being

¹ Fleming, op. cit., p. 253.

² SHM Melilla Leg. 27, Confidencias, Dar Mizian, nota, 22 June 1925.

³ Ibid., Sha'ib b. Muḥammad al-Marnisi, 24 June 1925.

⁴ Ibid., nota, 11 June 1925.

being cut as they were needed, on a day-to-day basis.¹ At the end of the month, they reported that the Banū Zarwāl had lost 1,000 men since the beginning of the fighting. The harvests had not been gathered in, for there was no one to do it. All the men had been forced to join the harkas, and anyone who did not was fined about 40 pesetas. Deserters had their goods confiscated; "An enormous feeling of tiredness is felt in all parts of the tribe, but people dare not complain because any sign of weakness is punished very heavily."² The same "tiredness" was also felt in the Mazziyāt tribe.³ The economic effects of all this were quickly felt.

A graph of the prices of essential commodities such as barley, sugar and tea shows a wild fluctuation in prices (see Table XII; 1).⁴ Thus the price of tea could very

¹ SHAT Maroc 156, 2ème Bureau Renseignements sur Abd el-Krim, B. des R., Reddouane, 5 July 1925.

² SHAT Maroc Rif 8, Groupement de Fez, Mai-Juin 1925, B. des R., Ain Aicha, 26 July 1925.

³ Ibid.

⁴ The graph is based on information contained in reports in the SHM Archives. The relevant reports are in SHM Melilla, Leg. 28:

(a) Información y confidencias de Tafarsit y Beni Tuzin, Muḥammad b. Salma, 11 June 1925;

(b) Oficina de Matalsa, hoja diaria, 15 June 1925.

(c) Información y confidencias de Tafarsit y Beni Tuzin, Hāmid b. Muḥammad Bū Ya'qūbī, 18 June 1925;

(d) Ibid., nota, 25 June 1925;

(e) Oficina de Matalsa, hoja diaria, 2 July 1925;

(f) Información y confidencias de Tafarsit y Beni Tuzin, Hāmid b. Muḥammad Bū Ya'qūbī, 12 July 1925;

(g) Oficina de Matalsa, hoja diaria, 16 July 1925;

(h) Hojas Diarias, Beni Walishak, hoja diaria, 21 July 1925;

(i) Hojas de Confidentes, Matalsa, Salāḥ b. Muḥammad, 22 July 1925.

(j) Hojas Diarias, Oficina de Beni Said, hoja diaria, 31 July 1925;

(k) Información y confidentes de Tafarsit y Beni Tuzin, Muḥammad b. 'Allāl Muḥand, 6 Aug. 1925;

(l) Hojas Diarias, Oficina de Beni Said, hoja diaria, 9 Aug. 1925;

(m) Hojas Diarias, Beni Walishak, hoja diaria, 10 Aug. 1925;

(n) Hojas de Confidentes, Matalsa, Muqqadam b. 'Amar, 7 Sept. 1925;

Table XII:1.
 Graph showing change in prices of tea sugar and barley 10 June 1925 - 12 September 1925.

between 50 pts a kilo on 9 August¹ and 3 pts a kilo at the beginning of September.² But these are extremes--in general, prices of everything showed a steady climb over these three months, and the differences in price between the summer of 1925 and the autumn of the previous year show an even more marked increase. Barley, 10 pts a kilo in October 1924, remained nearly constant, but other commodities increased in price greatly: soap from 2.25 pts a bar in October 1924 to 6 pts a bar in August 1925 (up 140%); candles from 50 ctos each in October 1924 to 1 pta each in August 1925 (up 100%); tea from 10 pts a kilo in October 1924 to 30 pts a kilo at the beginning of September 1925 (a 200% rise).³ It is scarcely surprising that at the end of July, the Banū Sa'id office reported "life is becoming impossible [in the Rifi zone],"⁴ and on 9 August talked of "fabulous prices" there.⁵

To a large extent the prices depended on the success of the smuggling operations from the French and Spanish zones. In June, those were still feasible, although many of

(o) Información y confidencias de Tafarsit y Beni Tuzin,
 'Abd al-Şadiq b. 'Abd al-Ush (sic) 13 Sept. 1925.

For an explanation of these weights and measures, see above, pp. xviii-xix. It might be argued that these figures are misleading because they refer to different markets on different days. To a certain extent this is true, but the fact that generally they show an overall uniformity of prices indicates that the bends shown on the graph are a reasonable guide to what was happening.

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 28, Hojas Diarias, Oficina de Beni Said, hoja diaria, 9 Aug. 1925.

² SHM Melilla Leg. 28, Hojas de Confidentes, Matalsa, Muqaddam b. 'Amar, 7 Sept. 1925.

³ The October figures are from SHM Melilla Leg. 27, Informacion Batil, nota, 28 Oct. 1924, the 1925 figures from the sources already mentioned above, p. 748, n. 4.

⁴ SHM Melilla Leg. 28, Hojas Diarias, Oficina de Beni Said, hoja diaria, 31 July 1925.

⁵ Ibid., hoja diaria, 9 Aug. 1925.

the smugglers were stopped by the Spanish. On 11 June, one such convoy was stopped in the Banū Walishak, and the Spanish recovered 30 loaves of sugar (worth about 120 pts at that date),¹ but in June contraband came in more easily through the French zone anyway.² However, as the war with the French went on, this supply route became more and more difficult. By the end of August, the Spanish were being told that there was no wheat or barley in the Rif at all.³ While this may have been an exaggeration, there can certainly have been very little, for bin 'Abd al-Karīm took steps to prevent any extravagance, and banned the celebration of weddings, what the Spanish describe as "baptisms", and other festivities.⁴

Not surprisingly these difficult economic conditions caused great political tension in the Rif itself. There were renewed, though muted, calls for an end to the war, and in some cases, attempts at rebellion.

The Political Control of the Rif

The combination of demands on manpower and economic difficulties caused considerable political problems within the Rif.

The demands on manpower were enormous. At the beginning of June there were reportedly 800 men from the Banū Waryaghal and Gaznaya tribes in the Gaznaya, facing the French, 500 Timsamānīs, Tuzānīs, and Waryaghlīs at 'Ain

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 28, Hojas Diarias, Beni Walishak, hoja diaria, 12 June 1925.

² Ibid., hoja diaria, 25 June 1925.

³ SHM Melilla Leg. 28, Información y confidencias, Tafarsit y Beni Tuzin, nota, 26 Aug. 1925.

⁴ Ibid., Khalīfa of Muḥammad b. 'Allāl Muḥand, 31 Aug. 1925.

Midyūna, 1,400 Jibālīs under Akhrīrū in the Wazzān region, and the Banū Warrayn tribes wrote to bin 'Abd al-Karīm asking him to send them help to cut the Tāza to Ujda railway; and this was by no means the full complement of Rifī troops in the field. This meant that the positions on the eastern front were reduced in numbers--there were only 40 men from the Banū Waryaghal and Gaznaya at Miḍār.¹ There was still a threat from the Spanish on the eastern front, and on 9 June it was reported that that area had been reinforced. 100 Waryaghlīs were sent to Sīdī Idrīs along with 50 Timsamānīs; 100 Tuzānīs to Sūq al-Sabat of Banū Walishak; 100 Timsamānīs to Sūq al-Jamā'a of the same tribe; and 50 Timsamānīs to Sīdī Misa'ūd.²

The mobilisation was strict. Bin 'Abd al-Karīm had even sent his prisoners to fight; then he threatened that all deserters were to be shot. He carried out this threat with a certain Qā'id Sha'ib who had abandoned a position on the French front when wounded, allowing the French to recapture it.³

More troops were sent to the Tetuan front, where there was heavy fighting around Dār bin Quraysh.⁴ 650 men from the Banū Walishak, Timsamān, Banū Tūzīn and Banū Waryaghal were sent on 21 or 22 June.⁵ In addition, on the eastern front he ordered that if a shot was heard, everyone was to go to the spot. Anyone who did not would be fined.⁶

¹ Ibid., 'Abd al-Rahmān b. Ḥāmid Ghāzī, 1 June 1925.

² SHM Melilla Leg. 27, Confidencias, Dar Mizian, nota, 9 June 1925.

³ Ibid., nota, 13 June 1925.

⁴ The Times, 18 June 1925, p. 16, dated Tangier, 17 June 1925.

⁵ SHM Melilla Leg. 27, Confidencias, Dar Mizian, Muḥammad b. Bil 'Azzā, 22 June 1925.

⁶ Ibid.

More troops were sent to the eastern front. 400 were reported on the beach in the Timsamān on 25 June,¹ and on 28 and 29 June, 600 Rifis arrived at Sūq al-Sabat of the Banū Walishak.² Sī 'Abd al-Salām b. al-Ḥājj Muḥand was sent to Jabal Yuddia on 25 June, and many other positions were reinforced as well.³

Bin 'Abd al-Karīm was now engaged heavily on all three fronts--against the French in the south, where he had by the end of June been forced to a halt, and against the Spanish on the Tetuan and eastern fronts. Of the 76 forward positions on the eastern front, 41 were attacked, and there was fighting on 21 days in June alone.⁴

Not surprisingly, the people were exhausted by all this activity. Many of the people who had fled from the Spanish occupation of the eastern part of the Banū Walishak now told the Spanish they would like to return home, but they could not leave their families in the Rif, and could not get past the Rifī guards.⁵ But bin 'Abd al-Karīm took no chances. Several Timsamānis, including many of the notables of the Trugūt clan, were arrested in mid-June for suspected contact with the Spanish.⁶ The amīr himself was reportedly escorted everywhere by "500 men in front of him and 500 behind" for fear of assassination.⁷

¹ Ibid., nota, 24 June 1925.

² Ibid., nota, 29 June 1925.

³ SHM Melilla Leg. 28, Información y confidencias, Tafarsit y Beni Tuzin, nota, 25 June 1925.

⁴ Fleming, op. cit., p. 256.

⁵ SHM Melilla Leg. 27, Confidencias, Dar Mizian, nota, 16 June 1925.

⁶ Ibid., nota, 15 June 1925, and SHM Melilla Leg. 28, Hojas de Confidentes, Matalsa, 'Abdallah b. Ḥāmid, 17 June 1925.

⁷ SHM Melilla Leg. 27, Confidencias, Dar Mizian, nota, 13 June 1925.

Bin 'Abd al-Karīm also stepped up the propaganda campaign in the Rif. He reverted to the old promises of European support, saying that France and Spain had been told to stop fighting the Rifis or the rest of Europe would attack them.¹ This was at the same time that his propagandists were making announcements of German support in Tangier. He also threatened that if those who had fled to the Spanish zone did not return, their property would be sold.²

Nevertheless, many of his subjects were unimpressed. They had heard of the Spanish and French conference at Madrid and complained to him that "it was not the same thing to fight with one nation as it was to fight with two." To this bin 'Abd al-Karīm replied that they nevertheless had to fight to the death. Anyone who did not would be shot.³

Clearly it was only a matter of time before the will to fight the Spanish gave way. The first glimmerings of a revolt appeared in the Banū Bū 'Ayyāsh clan of the Banū Waryaghāl at the end of June,⁴ but bin 'Abd al-Karīm took swift action to crush it. On 2 July, two 'Ayyāshī military qā'ids--'Abd al-Salām b. al-Ḥājj Muḥand, the former Minister of War, and Muḥammad Zāmī--were sacked along with Muḥ Azarqān, the qā'id of the clan.⁵ This may have been prompt action but it was most unwise, for the first two soon became overtly opposed to bin 'Abd al-Karīm, and in 1926

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 28, Beni Walishak, Hojas de Confidentes, Muḥammad Bū 'Azzā, 22 June 1925.

² SHM Melilla Leg. 28, Informaciones, Oficina de Kadia, Beni Said, Salām Akudūd, 26 June 1925.

³ SHM Melilla Leg. 28, Hojas Diarias, Oficina de Beni Said, nota, 28 June 1925.

⁴ SHM Melilla Leg. 27, Confidencias Dar Mizian, Ḥammu 'Allāl Amziyyān, 30 June 1925.

⁵ SHM Melilla Leg. 27, Confidencias, Dar Mizian, Muḥ Sha'ib, 2 July 1925.

led a revolt against him.

The revolt might have been crushed for the moment, but the undercurrent of discontent flowed on. In the front line tribes of Banū Walishak and Timsamān there were now many who wanted to submit. At the beginning of June, Muḥammad Bū Qaddur, probably one of the most consistent bet-hedgers of them all, again offered to change sides to the Spanish if and when they re-took Anwāl. In the Banū Walishak, the notables of the Banū Jabal (a sub-clan of the Banū Sabar clan) and the Banū 'Abd al-Nūr (a sub-clan of the Imazirān clan) promised to attack the Rifī positions if the Spanish advanced, provided that the Spanish confirmed them in their positions when they had reoccupied the tribe.¹

To prevent any possible defection, the positions on the eastern front and along the coast were again reinforced. On 12 July, one Spanish informant, who made no reference to the Banū Walishak, and scarcely any to the Banū Tūzīn, reported 1,200 troops in the Banū Waryaghāl (on the coast) and Timsamān.² In addition, bin 'Abd al-Karīm increased his personal control of government. In mid-July he announced that in future the qā'ids were not to have responsibility for decisions over "justice", and all complaints from the people in their charge were to go straight to him.¹ This meant that the qā'ids were removed from direct administration of the tribes, and their duties would be limited to the raising of ḥarkas and the enforcement of military discipline. This was in fact the declaration of a state of martial law.

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 27, Confidencias, Dar Mizian, nota, 1 July, 1925.

² They were distributed at Dahar Sijjum, near Ajdīr (100 Tūzānīs), on the mouth of thw W. Ghīs (100 Tūzānīs), on the mouth of the W. Nakur (100 Tūzānīs), near Sīdī Bū Da'ud in the Timsamān (100 Tūzānīs), at Sīdī Sha'ib in the Timsamān (100 Timsamānīs), hear Raṣ Ṭarf in the Timsamān (100 Timsamānīs), at Sīdī Idrīs in the Timsamān (200 Waryaghālīs), and 200 in the Miḍār area (all Waryaghālīs and Gaznāyīs). It is significant that those positions in the Banū Tūzīn that are mentioned were staffed by outsiders, and Tūzānī forces were used in the Banū Waryaghāl. Evidently bin 'Abd al-Karīm did not trust the Tūzānīs and preferred their troops to be under his eye in the Banū Waryaghāl while their tribe was guarded by Waryaghālīs. SHM Melilla Leg. 28, Información y confidencias, Tafarsit y Beni Tuzin, Ḥāmid al-Bū Ya'qūbī, 12 July 1925.

From now on, bin 'Abd al-Karīm's grip became even tighter. All talk of casualties was again forbidden.² The cordon between the Spanish and Rifi zones was strengthened and on 24 July the Spanish reported that no people from the "unsubmitted zone" had been seen at the Maṭālsa market.³

With his efforts to control possible defections and rebellions, which bin 'Abd al-Karīm succeeded in doing with ease, the eastern front itself was relatively quiet during July. Only 18 of the 76 front line Spanish positions were attacked, and there was fighting on only 11 days.⁴

However, in August the campaign on the eastern front was stepped up. On 2 August, there was a meeting at Sūq al-Khamīs of the Timsamān, at which bin 'Abd al-Karīm presided, and it agreed to attack the Spanish in the Banū Sa'id and Miḍār sectors. Bin 'Abd al-Karīm said that he had sent money to the Spanish zone to win support behind the Spanish lines.⁵ However, in order to do this, he had

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 27, Confidencias, Dar Mizian, Muḥammad Bū 'Azzā, 14 July 1925.

² SHM Melilla Leg. 28, Hojas de Confidentes, Matalsa, A'isha b. 'Amar Akarrūsh, 21 July 1925.

³ SHM Melilla Leg. 28, Oficina de Matalsa, hoja diaria, 24 July 1925.

⁴ Fleming, op. cit., p. 256.

⁵ SHM Melilla Leg. 27, Confidencias, Dar Mizian, Muḥ b. Sha'ib al-Marnīsī, 2 Aug. 1925.

to cut back on the number of troops he sent against the French, and when Bū Raḥayl of the Maṭālsa asked him for 500 men with which to attack the French as Masun, the request was refused. Bin 'Abd al-Karīm explained that he needed the men for the attack on 'Azīb Miḍār.¹

On 13 August, the Spanish were told that Bū Laḥya had been put in charge of 1,500 to 2,000 men in the Miḍār area. Apparently, many of the members of the ḥarka were unwilling recruits, which infuriated Bū Laḥya, who called them "cowards".² On 14 August, 200 Timsamānis and Walishakis were grouped at Anwāl, and bin 'Abd al-Karīm announced the imminent arrival of a column of Jibālīs under Akhrirū on the eastern front.³

However, the Rifī troops were vastly overstretched. Bin 'Abd al-Karīm, having built up forces on the eastern front, was forced to send reinforcements back to the south, where he felt the French were about to advance.⁴ On 18 August, 1,000 men, many from the Banū Walishak and Banū Tūzin, were sent to the Gharb to fight the French.⁵ Yet in other parts of the southern front, Rifī troops were withdrawn. On 21 August, Sī Maḥammad was reported in Banū Barbar, where he had gone to reassure people that they were not being abandoned.⁶ On 26 August, bin 'Abd al-Karīm arranged a large

¹ SHAT Maroc Rif 8, Groupement de Fez, Mai-Juin 1925, B. des R., 11 Aug. 1925.

² SHM Melilla Leg. 27, Confidencias, Dar Mizian, al-'Arbī b. Muḥ al-Wālī, 13 Aug. 1925.

³ Ibid., nota, 14 Aug. 1925 and 'Amar b. Ḥammu, 14 Aug. 1925.

⁴ SHM Melilla Leg. 28, Información y confidencias de Tafar-sit y Beni Tuzin, Muḥammad b. 'Allāl Muḥand, 14 Aug. 1925.

⁵ SHM Melilla Leg. 27, Confidencias, Dar Mizian, Muḥand Bū 'Azzā, 18 Aug. 1925.

⁶ SHAT Maroc Rif 8, Groupement de Fez, Mai-Juin 1925, B. des R., 21 Aug. 1925.

harka in the Banū Waryaghāl to send to the Larache front.¹

By now, the demands for troops to defend the Rīf were so overwhelming that, when the Banū Waryaghāl harka departed to the Gharb, bin 'Abd al-Karīm told the people of Ajdīr that henceforward "the old men and wounded" would have to be responsible for its defence."² A week or so before this, bin 'Abd al-Karīm had repeated his order that anyone who heard gunfire was to go to the place immediately. This time, however, the penalty for failing to do so was not a fine, but the death penalty.³

However, despite these difficulties, bin 'Abd al-Karīm was still in full control of the situation. He even managed to increase the attacks on Spanish positions on the eastern front in August: 42 of the 76 front line positions were attacked during this month and there was fighting on 20 days--a considerable increase over the figures for July (18 positions and 11 days).⁴ Moreover, he proceeded to the disarmament of the Banū Tūzīn. On 25 August he ordered that all this tribe's arms should be taken to Ajdīr.⁵ He stopped rumours about the death of Akhrīrū--which anyway were quite untrue--by threatening to cut out the tongue of anyone who spoke of it.⁶ On 31 August came the order forbidding any further celebration of weddings and other festivities.

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 28, Hojas de Confidentes, Matalsa, 'Abdallah b. Muḥammad Akashar, 26 Aug. 1925.

² Ibid.

³ SHM Melilla Leg. 27, Confidencias, Dar Mizian, Muḥand Bū 'Azzā, 18 Aug. 1925.

⁴ Fleming, op. cit., p. 256.

⁵ SHM Melilla Leg. 28, Oficina de Matalsa, hoja diaria, 25 Aug. 1925.

⁶ SHM Melilla Leg. 28, Información y confidencias, Tafarsit y Beni Tuzin, 'Abd al-Salām b. Ḥammu, 28 Aug. 1925.

The Rif was moving towards total mobilisation. On 30 August, bin 'Abd al-Karīm ordered all the men over 15 years old of the al-Maṭālsa to meet at the site of the Tuesday market of Banū Bū Bakar to form a ḥarka.¹ On 1 September it was reported that he had ordered his Pashas to recruit men for the ḥarkas. Qā'id Bū Hūt was sent to the Brānis area with a large ḥarka.² On 2 September, French sources reported that a general mobilisation had been ordered throughout the Rif.³ By 7 February a huge number of men had been mobilised. One Spanish informant put the number on the eastern front at 1,500 (on the coast at Sidi Idrīs and Sidi Ḥussayn and in the Miḍār districts alone, which again leaves out many other positions).⁴ Other informants reported 8,500 on the Fez front, and another 3,000 in the Brānis, nearly all from the Jibāla.⁵ However, bin 'Abd al-Karīm was concerned most of all for the defence of the coast, where a Spanish landing was expected at any moment. There were reported to be 3,000 troops at Alhucemas and another 1,100 at Wādī Lāw in the Jibāla, under Akhrīrū.⁶

Bin 'Abd al-Karīm was not wrong in his assessment of the danger to the coasts; the French and Spanish had been planning a landing for some time.

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 28, Oficina de Matalsa, hoja diaria, 30 Aug. 1925.

² Ibid., hoja diaria, 1 Sept. 1925.

³ SHAT Maroc Rif 8; Groupement de Fez, Mai-Juin 1925, B. des R., 2 Sept. 1925.

⁴ SHM Melilla Leg. 28, Hojas de confidentes, Matalsa, Salāḥ b. Muḥammad Ḥammūsh, 5 Sept. 1925.

⁵ SHM Melilla Leg. 28, Oficina de Matalsa, hoja diaria, 6 Sept. 1925.

⁶ SHM Melilla Leg. 28, Hojas de Confidentes, Matalsa, Salāḥ b. Muḥammad Ḥammūsh, 5 Sept. 1925.

The Preparation for the Landing at Alhucemas

After the failures of Gabrielli and Echevarrieta, both sides made one more attempt to negotiate with the Rifis. Echevarrieta visited Alhucemas once more, in mid-August.¹ Details of his negotiations are unclear, as are those of French negotiators, who also apparently arrived at the same time. Apparently both the European powers had been trying for some time to arrange a separate peace with the Rifis, for on 4 August Harris telegraphed privately to his newspaper: "Situation delightful stop both France and Spain been trying to make separate peace--Harris."² However, this renewed attempt at peace apparently convinced bin 'Abd al-Karim that he was still "the master of the situation and in these circumstances it was for him to impose his conditions and not for his adversaries."³ To show his contempt for his enemies he proceeded to order the bombardment of Alhucemas Island, on 20 August.⁴ Alhucemas, for most of the war, had been immune from this sort of attack because it remained an "open" port, for continuing trade with the mainland. It was an anomalous position, certainly, but the Spanish wanted to keep its island fairly peaceful, because it relied on water supplies from the mainland, for which privilege they paid a large "bribe" to the Rifis,⁵ while the Rifis depended on it as a source of food supplies. After the failure of these

¹ The Times, 17 Aug. 1925, p. 10.

² TAHP, The Times, Correspondence, 1894-1933, Telegram, Harris to The Times, Tangier, 4 Aug. 1925, "Not for Publication--very confidential."

³ SHAT Maroc E24, Propagande Riffaine, B. des R., Amjot, 16 Sept. 1925.

⁴ Ibid., and The Times, 22 Aug. 1925, p. 10, dated Madrid, 21 Aug. 1925.

⁵ Fleming, op. cit., p. 272.

negotiations the Spanish began to move towards making the final preparation for a landing in Alhucemas Bay.

Primo began to make plans for an invasion at Alhucemas Bay in April 1925.¹ He was doubtless encouraged by the success of the disembarkation at al-Qaṣr al-Ṣaghīr in the 'Anjara on 30 March, which The Times correspondent in Madrid believed to have been "a practice run for the disembarkation at Alhucemas."²

Primo's new plans involved the Air Force and Navy fully in a bombardment of the coastline and only Moroccan Regulares and regular Spanish troops--not conscripts--would be involved. The dictator received approval from the King and on 11 May he told his Chief of Staff of the plan and instructed him to make preparations for late June. However, when the French agreed to cooperate with the Spanish at the Madrid conference, the invasion plans were put back to late August or early September 1925, in order to allow for the incorporation of a token French naval force.³

Not surprisingly, in spite of the secrecy in which the plans were made, news inevitably leaked out to the Rifis; this explains bin 'Abd al-Karīm's concern with the coasts in July and August and his attempts to juggle with his overstretched troops. The bombardment of Alhucemas, on 20 August, was an act of open defiance, for the guns of Alhucemas were to be used in the attack.⁴

Nevertheless, the final preparations continued. On

¹ Fleming, op. cit., p. 263.

² The Times, 8 Apr. 1925, p. 14, dated Madrid, 7 Apr. 1925.

³ Fleming, op. cit., pp. 263-264.

⁴ Ibid., p. 272.

1 September the operational commanders were given their "General Instructions for the Disembarking Operation in Alhucemas Bay".¹

On 8 September, after simulated landings at Wādī Lāw in the west and Sīdī Idrīs in the Timsamān, Spanish troops disembarked in Alhucemas Bay. The invasion of the Rīf had begun.

Conclusion

The general view is that the Rīfī invasion of the French zone was a mistake. Fleming, for instance, claims that:

"The vague nationalist ideology that motivated the top leaders of the Riff Rebellion [sic] was given in almost every case precedence over hard military considerations. And this was especially true when Abd el-Krim ordered the invasion of the French Protectorate in April 1925."²

David Hart, who is much more sympathetic to the Rifis than Fleming, also considered the invasion a "hopeless" undertaking.³ Why then did the Rīfī leadership undertake such an apparently foolhardy enterprise?

Fleming offers a useful basis for discussion⁴ by putting forward four possible explanations for the invasion of the French zone. The first is based on the fact that bin 'Abd al-Karīm nearly reached Fez, where, had he entered the city, he might have been able to claim the Sultanate. His aims, according to this theory, were to liberate all of Morocco. There is, at first sight, a certain credibility in this position. Bin 'Abd al-Karīm's own propaganda seems

¹ Ibid., p. 276.

² Ibid., p. 239.

³ Hart, Aith Waryaghar, p. 396.

⁴ Fleming, op. cit., pp. 236-239.

to suggest it: his letter to the Fāssi 'ulamā' contains a call for jihād, and for the religious leaders of Morocco to cooperate with the only true leader of the holy war. However, if bin 'Abd al-Karīm was as able a leader as he clearly was, he must have realised that he could hardly hope to conquer the whole of Morocco. The most he could expect was for the rest of Morocco to rise with him, and eject the French from their zone.

Another possible explanation is that invasion was an attempt to pre-empt a French attack on the Rif, for the very existence of the Rifi state challenged that of the Protectorate. If the Rifis could cause enough damage to the French, the latter might be willing to recognise his leadership.

A third possible explanation is that bin 'Abd al-Karīm wished only to eject the French from the Wargha valley in order to safeguard his supplies of food. There is a considerable amount of truth in this, but it provides no reason for the advance on Fez, which is not in the Wargha valley.

A fourth possible explanation, to which Fleming gives some credit is that bin 'Abd al-Karīm was encouraged to invade the French zone by his "European advisers", by which is meant presumably the French Communist Party who assured him of the opposition of the French people to the war, and the "Riff Committee"¹ in London, and by his cabinet who wanted to continue the war to the south, and in no way acted as a brake upon their leader.²

¹ See below, ch. XIII for a discussion of the rôle of the Riff Committee.

² Fleming, op. cit., pp. 236-239.

All these theories ignore both the sequence of events and bin 'Abd al-Karīm's own stated opposition to the invasion of the French zone.¹ Certainly, throughout 1924 and 1925 he tried to restrain the attacks on the French zone. According to him, his only aim was to ensure his grain supplies.²

However, bin 'Abd al-Karīm was well aware that an attack on the French positions in the Wargha valley was tantamount to a declaration of war. He was also aware that such an attack would lead to spontaneous action by the tribes of the French zone. He therefore planned his invasion with great care.

Nothing was done until the absolute obedience of the Jibāla tribes had been secured, and it is here that the sequence of events becomes important. Control of the Jibāla was vital because the majority of the troops which were used in the attack on the Banū Zarwāl were not Rifis but Jibālis. He appointed administrators and qā'ids, erected telephone lines and built roads and fortifications. Above all, he secured the area politically to such an extent that no one dared to oppose him. Certainly the new close control of every aspect of life did not appeal to many of the people of the Jibāla but they could do little to oppose bin 'Abd al-Karīm because his position in the Rif itself was unassailable. It is instructive to compare Sheean's account of his meeting with the 'Arūsī shaykhs who were less than enthusiastic about the new Sultan, as he seems to have been commonly called, to the same writer's meeting with the qā'ids of the al-Maṭālsa tribe a few weeks earlier when he was given a colourful and highly exaggerated account of the Anwāl victories and of the power of Muḥammad bin 'Abd al-Karīm:

¹ E.g., in Roger-Matheiu, op. cit., pp. 137-140, bin 'Abd al-Karīm claims that he was dragged into an invasion by a spontaneous rising in the French zone.

² Ibid., p. 140.

"And the Riffi killed and killed and killed, until there were one hundred and sixty-four thousand million Spaniards dead upon the field . . . And Generan Barro [sic., i.e, General Navarro in Rifi mispronunciation] and all the coroneles and tenientes and many thousands and thousands of men worked for the sultan, on the roads and as slaves. The sultan is very great; the sultan is the Lord of Islam. The sultan can defeat all enemies in battle, The sultan has many millions of fighting men who will sweep the French and English and all the Christians out of the Arab's country. When the sultan has driven the Spanish into the sea, he will go to Spain and drive them out of there too. Spain is Arab country. The Riffi will kill until he¹ is tired, and he will take all the rest prisoners."

Admittedly the whole performance was put on for a visiting European journalist, and in those circumstances the exaggerations are understandable. Nevertheless, they are exaggerations born of a real feeling of confidence that under the amīr's leadership jihād would lead to the liberation not only of the Rif, but also of the rest of Morocco. Once this is understood, Fleming's remarks about the "vague nationalist ideology that motivated the top leaders of the Riff Rebellion" may be seen to be incorrect. The real heat of nationalist feeling came from below, from the qā'ids in the tribes, and from the ordinary people who were convinced of the efficacy of bin 'Abd al-Karīm's leadership, and who believed that their "Sultan" would go on to eject all the "Christians" from Morocco. Whether bin 'Abd al-Karīm wanted to invade the French zone or not, the pressure put on him from below, from people like Sheean's Maṭālsī qā'id or the people described by 'Alī al-Majāwī on the French front who were eager to attack, was such that he would eventually be obliged to take some sort of action against the French.

¹ Sheean, Adventures, p. 47. See above p. 722 for the 'Arūsī shaykhs.

In any event, bin 'Abd al-Karīm was already committed to a limited engagement against the French positions in the Wargha valley. He knew that such an attack would bring him into conflict with the French anyway, and this, combined with the feeling which seems to have been widespread, in the Rif at least, for an attack on the French made the general attack inevitable. It was this sequence of events, the completion of the war against the Spanish in the west, the attack on the Banū Zarwāl, and the imposition of a state of martial law over most of the Rif which brought about the attack, not the support of "foreign advisers"--as will be shown, Canning, one of the principal members of the Rif Committee, did his best, after the Spanish landings in Alhucemas to bring about a negotiated settlement to the war¹--and certainly not nationalist ideology overriding military considerations among the leadership.

What was prepared then, was an attack on the French positions with the dual objectives firstly of satisfying the demands of the Rifī public, and secondly of wresting back control of the grain supplies in the Wargha valley. Notwithstanding the millenarist propaganda in Fez, it was to be a limited campaign, as the careful preparation of defensive positions on which Rifī forces could retire clearly shows.

Nevertheless, even an attack limited in its objectives raised insurmountable problems. Quite simply, the Rifis, even with the assistance of the Jibālīs, did not have enough men. The economic costs of the mobilisation were enormous, and prices shot up (and occasionally down) in a most disruptive way. Despite the discontent this caused, bin 'Abd al-Karīm never lost control, for his authority reached down to all sectors of the Rīf and Jibāla. In each village he had his secret policemen and women. His officers had authority over who could stay in a particular place--such as Ajdīr--and who could leave it. There was a well developed bureaucracy. Everything that 'Alī al-Majāwī said, or the Banū Zarwāl notables said, was written down. The political and social control of the Rīf that the government machine exercised was quite clearly very great.

¹ See below, pp. 806-809.

However, the authority largely--though by now not entirely--rested upon bin 'Abd al-Karīm's ability to lead the war against the Christians. This is reflected in his propaganda. The Fasī : 'ulamā' were called upon to recognise him as the legitimate leader of the jihād, the people of the Banū Zarwāl were encouraged to support him in the name of a "regenerated Islam", the people of Tangier were told that he had the support of Germany, which would allow him to continue the war.

So bin 'Abd al-Karīm was forced to enter the French zone, because of popular demand and the economic and political need to dominate the Wargha. He could not accept the various French and Spanish offers of "autonomy" under their overall authority, because to do so would have been to deny the basis of his leadership, and his support would have ebbed away.

The invasion of the French zone was necessary for these reasons but inevitably it brought the seeds of defeat.

The French and Spanish combined were too much for the Rifis and the landing at Alhucemas began the final stages of the conflict.

Chapter XIII

THE COLLAPSE OF THE RĪFĪ STATE

"You can sleep on the road in the Riff, which you can do neither in the French nor the Spanish zone."

Alexander Langlet, a Swedish journalist, writing of the social conditions of the Rīf in March and April 1926.¹

"We have not lost hope that you will know all about our victories and those which the glorious army of God must achieve [in the future]."

Bin 'Abd al-Karīm, trying to encourage a qā'id fighting for the Spanish to change sides, in February 1926.²

"I pray to God that times like those will never return."

Idrīs Mimūn Khujja, a prominent Rīfī military qā'id, speaking after the war of the final days of the collapse of Rīfī resistance.³

The Rīfī invasion of the French zone had been taken from a position of relative strength, although it was itself the cause of an alliance between the French and the Spanish which led to the eventual destruction of the Rīf. However, because the Rīfī forces were strong when the French and Spanish counter-attacks began, the two European armies were not able to defeat the Rīfīs immediately. Because of the determination of the resistance and the difficulties caused by the winter weather, the advances stopped in October, and operations remained largely dormant during the next few months. As a result, bin 'Abd al-Karim was able to reinforce his political position even after the landings at Alhucemas. The system of government did not break down until the last month of the war, public order was maintained, and the bureaucracy continued to function. Langlet wrote that the countryside was safer in the Rif than in the areas controlled by the French or Spanish. To complement this political stability, bin 'Abd al-Karim conducted a vigorous propaganda campaign, not only within the Rif itself, but among the Moroccan members of the opposing armies, and even further afield, far behind the French lines in southern Morocco, hoping to bring about a rising there.

¹ Manchester Guardian, 29 Apr. 1926, p. 9.

² Spanish translation of a letter from bin 'Abd al-Karīm to Qā'id Sī al-Mallālī in B.N.A. in Miscelenea Garcia Figueras, Vol. XLII (no page number).

³ Quoted in Andrés Sánchez-Pérez, La Acción Decisiva contra Abd-el-Krim, in Colección Bibliográfica Militar, Vol. XXVIII, Toledo, Dec. 1930, p. 137.

Nevertheless, in the end the French and Spanish combined forces were bound to prove too much for the Rifis. Matters were made worse by the great hardship caused by the collapse of food supplies and of the economy in general. Eventually, bin 'Abd al-Karim tried to negotiate a settlement but this proved impossible. For their part, the French and Spanish made another attempt at negotiations and a conference was held at Oujda in the French zone but this also failed. By the beginning of May the conditions within the Rif were so bad that when the French and Spanish attacked, organised resistance collapsed.

However, the fighting did not completely stop, but continued for several months in the Jibāla and Sinhāja. This fighting was highly localised, and based on the old forms of resistance that bin 'Abd al-Karim had tried to replace-- small-scale leaders, acting independently and in disunity, who were bound to fail. It was the collapse of the Central Rif which led to the full victory of the European allies and for this reason this chapter is focused largely on that area.

The Spanish Invasion

The Spanish had undertaken much preparation for the attack on the Rif so it is not surprising that the force that was used for the invasion was suitably impressive. It consisted of some 16,300 men, some of whom were support troops,¹ transported to the landing-place in a fleet of sixty three civilian ships borrowed from a civil shipping line, thirty three from the Spanish Navy, and eight from the French Navy. They were also supported by eighty eight land-based aeroplanes and twelve seaplanes.² Facing this force on the Rifi coast were some 5,000 men.³

The operation began, on the morning of 8 September, with an artillery bombardment of the shores of Alhucemas Bay. In mid-morning the disembarkation began, but not in the Bay itself. The chosen spot was a beach north-west of the Bay, west of Ra's 'Abid, which the Spanish called "Playa Cebadilla", and the Rifis "Taḥjarūt".⁴

Possible^y this choice of landing-place took the defenders by surprise, but with such a long coastline to defend, and with the balance of forces firmly in favour of ¹ Goded, op. cit., pp. 150-151. The total number, however, was nearly 21,000. Fleming, op. cit., p. 264.

² Ibid., p. 149, and Woolman, op. cit., p. 149.

³ Fleming, op. cit., p. 298.

⁴ Woolman, op. cit., p. 19., and al-Bū 'Ayyāshī, op. cit., Vol. II, p. 425.

the Spanish, it is not surprising that the Spanish succeeded in disembarking with relatively little difficulty. By nightfall the Spanish forces, led by the then Colonel Francisco Franco, had taken position between Cebadilla and the rocky point south of Ra's al-'Abīd known as "Morro Viejo" (see Map XIII: 1). Although the landing of further troops was prevented by high winds on the following day, it continued on 10 September. By the end of that day 9,000 men had disembarked.¹

Once they had disembarked, however, matters became more difficult. The terrain south of Ra's al-'Abīd is very irregular, with many valleys and coves and caves in the sides of the hills. The resistance was fierce and the Spanish took a long time to fight their way forward. More troops were landed on 13 September,² but it was not until 23 September that Goded succeeded in fighting his way onto the beach of Cala Quemada,³ which is now the beach of al-Ḥusayma town, while Franco took Jabal Malmūsī. By that evening the Spanish line had reached the point of Morro Viejo, south of Cala Quemada.⁴

The next few days were reasonably quiet, until on 30 September the advance began again. Spanish forces reached Jabal Bū Jibār, on the coast, and Jabal Hammam on their right flank, that evening.⁵ On the following days they advanced still further, crossing the Wādī Islī and taking Jabal Sijjum on 1 October. On 2 October, Spanish forces entered

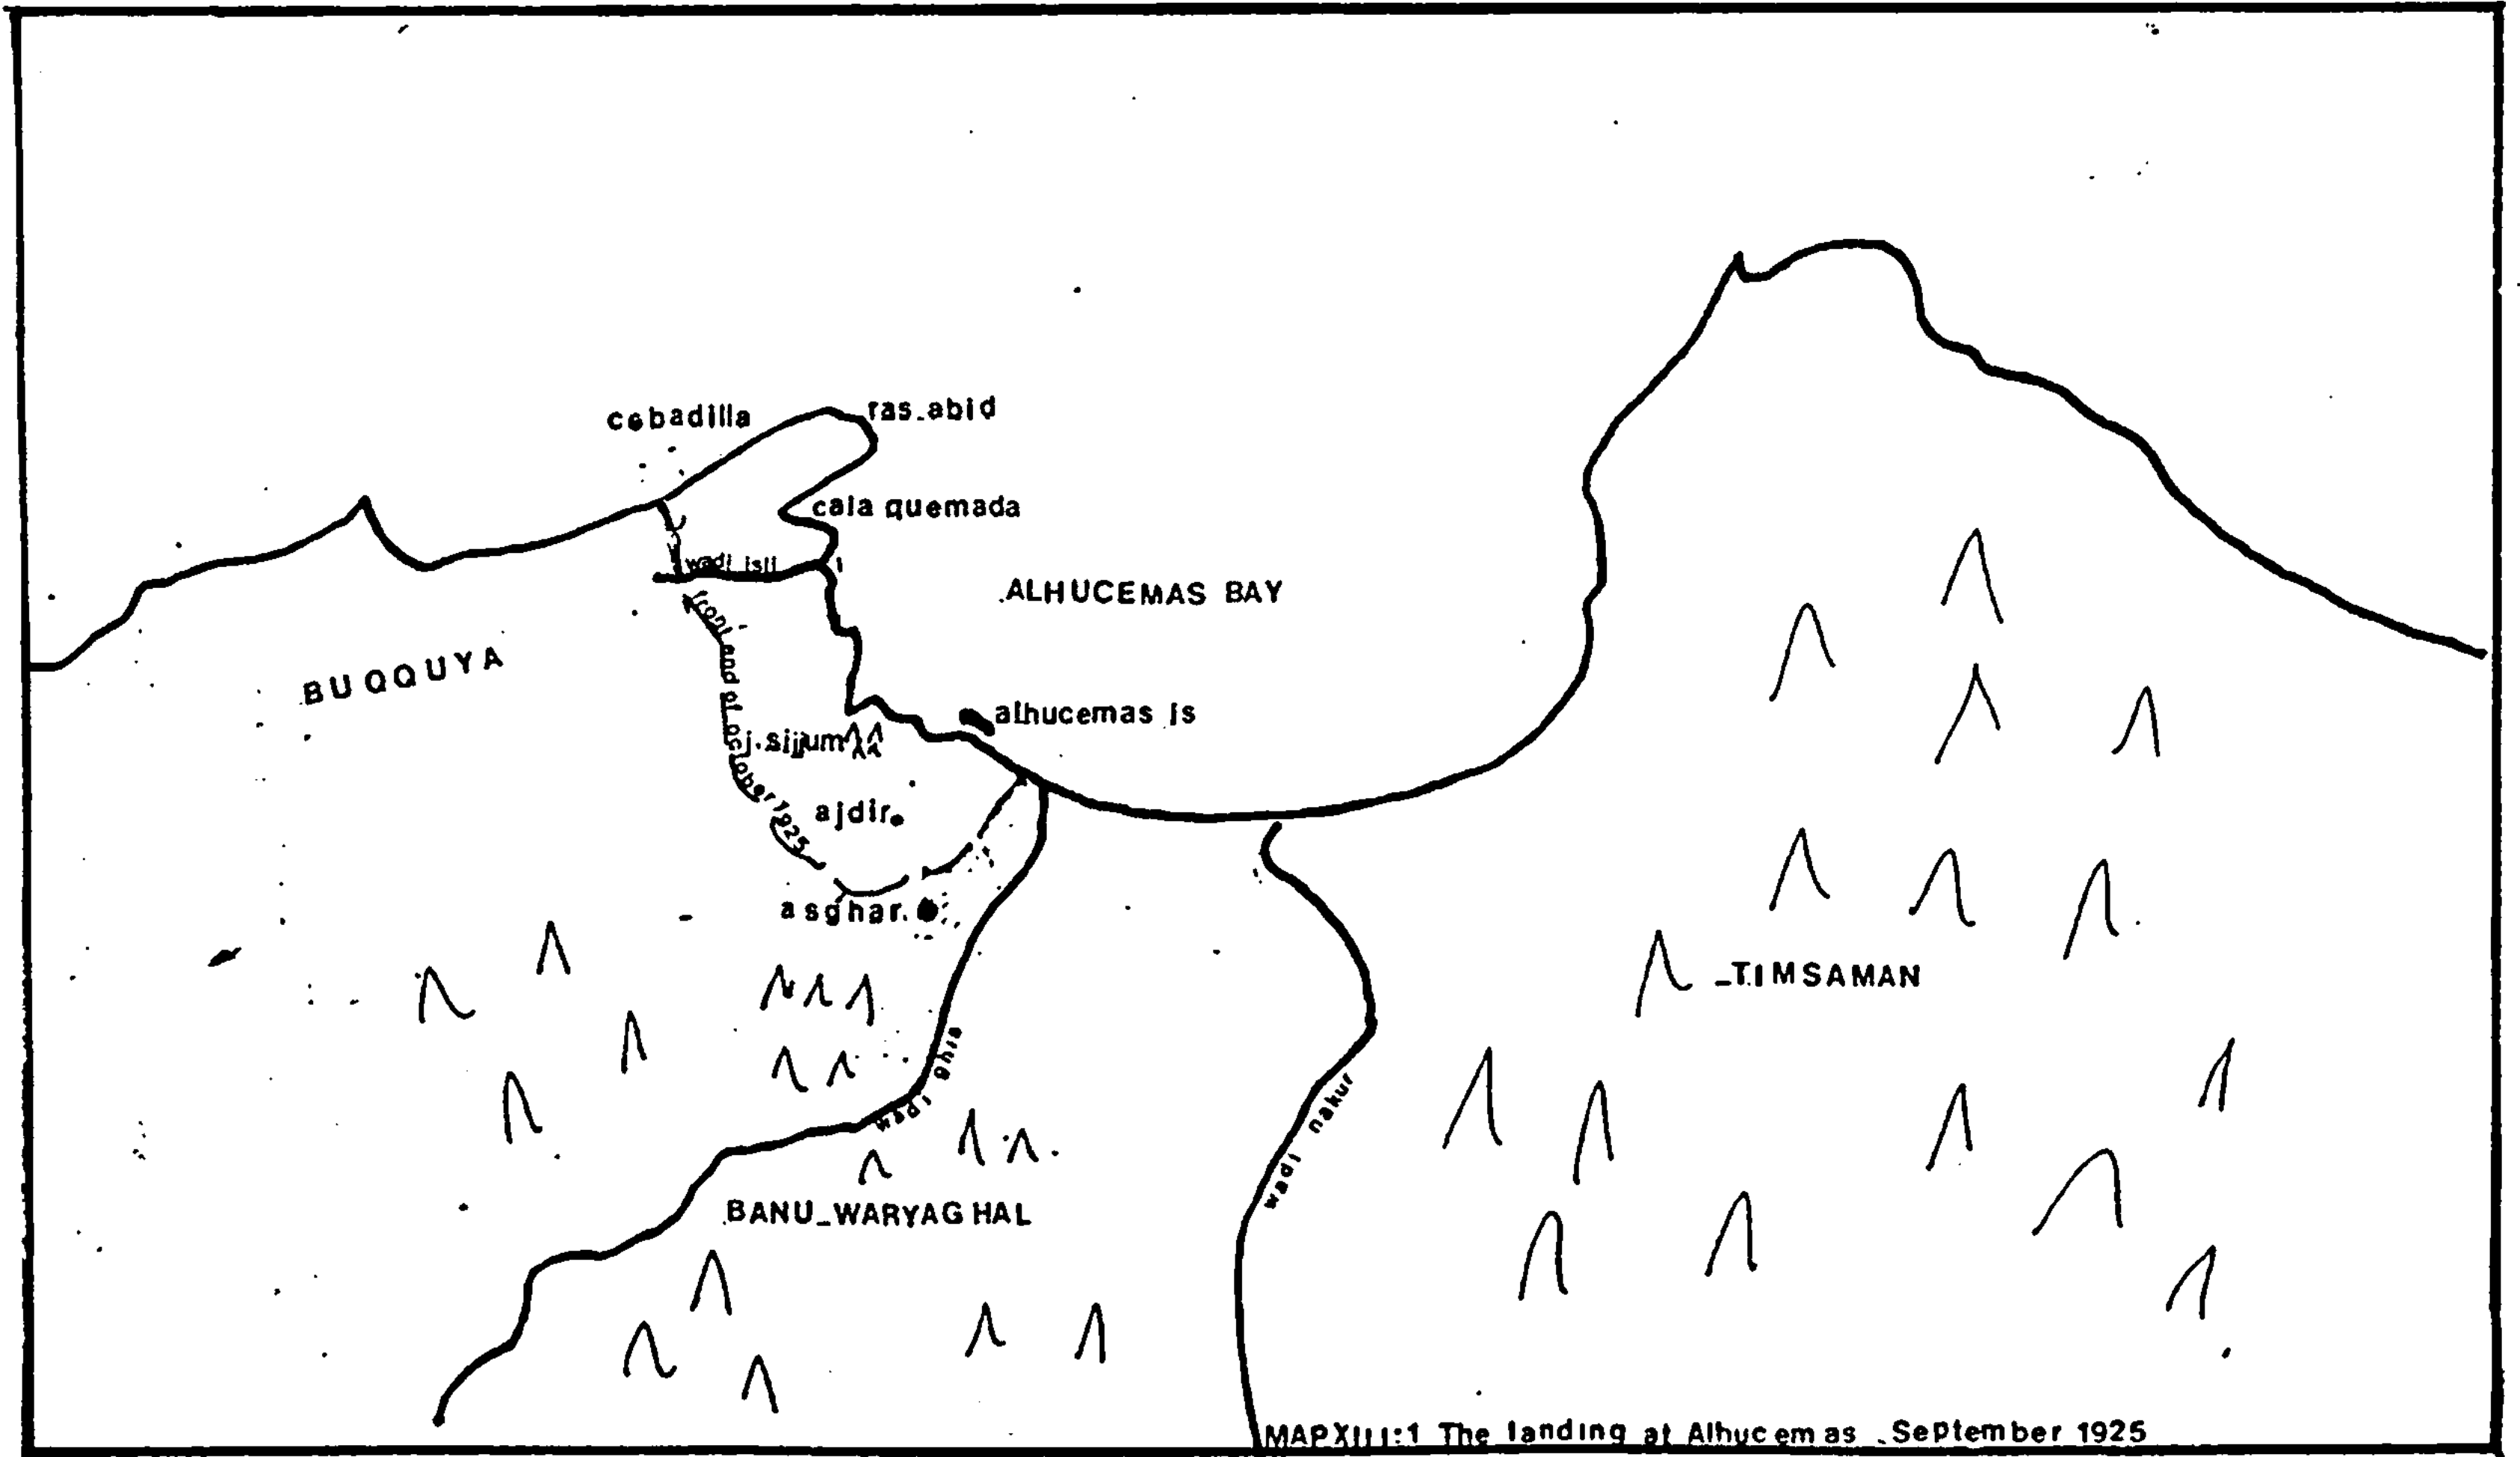

¹ Martínez de Campos, op. cit., pp. 306-309.

² Ibid., p. 312.

³ Woolman, op. cit., p. 192.

⁴ Martínez de Campos, op. cit., p. 314, and Goded, op. cit., map 3.

⁵ Martínez de Campos, op. cit., p. 317.

773

MAPXIII:1 The landing at Alhucemas September 1925

Ajdīr itself, which was then burned.¹ Here, on Primo's instructions, the advance stopped. The Spanish dictator was nervous of over-extending his troops before they had a secure base from which to advance, and decided to spend some time constructing stronger defences and ensuring control of the area that the Spanish already held.²

Meanwhile, the French in the south had begun their offensive on 10 September. They started with a push to the north in the Wargha valley and in the Kiffān area.³ Their advance was extremely rapid. In the first two days they moved forward over a 36-mile front to re-take most of the Banū Zarwāl, including Amjuṭṭ, the former headquarters of the Darqāwiya order.⁴ However, 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Darqāwī did not return until the war was quite over.⁵ By 16 September, Jabal Bibān was cleared of Rifis, and 1,200 families from the Banū Zarwāl and 450 from the Banū Masgilda had submitted to the French.⁶

At the end of September, French forces moved along the valley of the upper Wādī Masūn and Wādī Wizārt from Kiffān in the direction of the Wādī Karṭ.⁷ By 2 October they were positioned on the southern borders of the al-Maṭālsa tribe.⁸ On 4 October an advance was started in the Tawnāt

¹ Ibid., and Woolman, op. cit., p. 192, and Fleming, op. cit., p. 307, and al-Bū 'Ayyāshī, op. cit., Vol. II, pp. 436-437

² Fleming, op. cit., pp. 307-308.

³ Woolman, op. cit., p. 193, and The Times, 11 Sept. 1925, p. 12, dated Paris and Madrid, 10 Sept. 1925.

⁴ The Times, 13 Sept. 1925, p. 12, dated Tangier, 13 Sept. 1925, and SHAT Maroc E24, Propagande Rifaine, Lyautey to Ministre des Affaires Etrangères, Rabat, 24 Sept. 1925.

⁵ Al-Fihri, op. cit., p. 48.

⁶ The Times, 17 Sept. 1925, p. 12, dated Paris, 16 Sept. 1925.

⁷ Ibid., 1 Oct. 1925, p. 14, dated Paris, 30 Sept. 1925.

⁸ Ibid., 3 Oct. 1925, p. 10, dated Paris, 2 Oct. 1925.

sector of the front, up the valley of the Wādī Laban towards the Sinhāja Srair tribes.¹ Spanish and French troops finally met at Siyāḥ, near Sūq al-Thalathā' of Banū Bū Bakar on 6 October, for a Spanish force had moved down from Dār Driūsh.² French forces occupied Jabal Naḡūr, some 15-20 miles north of Kiffān, on 7 October, and 'Ain Zuhra on 8 October.³ On 13 October French operations were suspended for the winter,⁴ in order to give time to prepare before the snow and bad weather began. In fact snow started falling on the southern front on 16 November.⁵

In this way the Rīf was completely surrounded by a ring of French and Spanish forces on a front stretching from Afraw in the east, through 'Azīb Miḡār, Siyāḥ, Jabal 'Azrū, Fazzāra, Bāb Tāza, then into the Wargha valley through Sakkar, Bibān, to Wazzān, and then through the foothills of the western Jibāla by the Fundūg of 'Ain al-Jadīda to Tetuan. In addition, the Spanish had a small front around Alhucemas Bay, and had the still unsubmitted 'Anjara tribe surrounded.⁶ It certainly looked a bleak picture for the Rīfis. However, there still remained a very large area--the majority of the Spanish Protectorate--which was by no means defeated. Conditions in this area were difficult, certainly, but the Rīf was still quite able to resist.

¹ Ibid., 5 Oct. 1925, p. 14, dated Paris, 4 Oct. 1925, and 6 Oct. p. 14, dated Paris, 5 Oct. 1925.

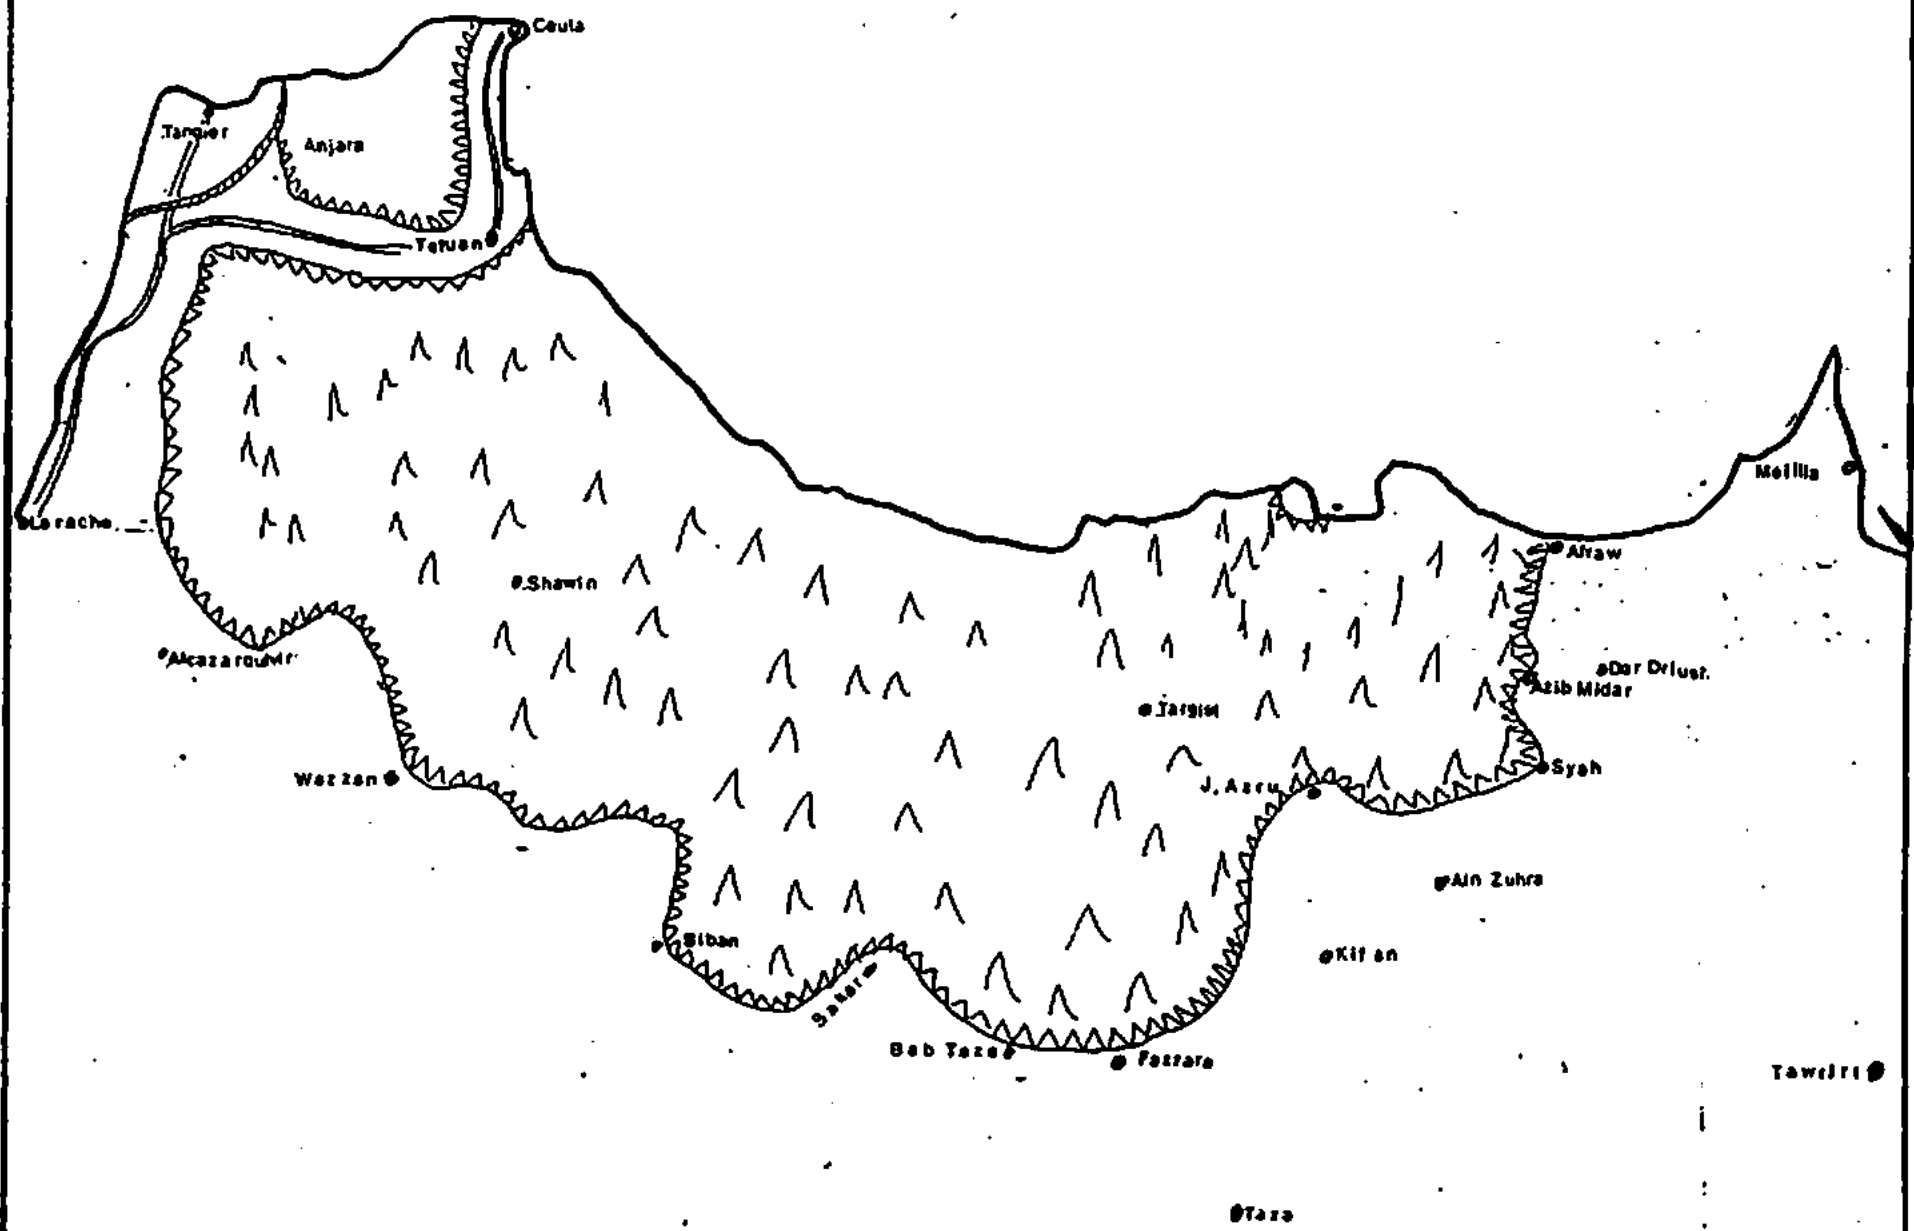

² Ibid., 6 Oct. 1925, p. 14, dated Madrid, 5 Oct. 1925, and 7 Oct. 1925, p. 14, dated Paris, 6 Oct. 1925.

³ Ibid., 8 Oct. 1925, p. 14, dated Paris, 7 Oct. 1925, and 9 Oct. 1925.

⁴ Ibid., 14 Oct. 1925, p. 16, dated Paris, 13 Oct. 1925.

⁵ Ibid., 17 Nov. 1925, p. 13, dated Paris, 16 Oct. 1925.

⁶ Map in Maroc Rif 12 dossier 3, "Croquis Schématique du Nord Marocain".

MAP XIII:2 The front line 25 October 1925

The Rifi Response

News of the Spanish landings spread fairly quickly, particularly in areas bordering on to the Spanish lines. On 8 September, the day of the landings, the Spanish announced the news to the Banū Walishak. In the areas which were already occupied by the Spanish, it was greeted, Military Intelligence reported, with some pleasure.¹ It is difficult to know what reliance to place on this for to show disappointment might have led to speedy detention by the Military authorities. On the Rifi side of the front lines the news spread less quickly. On the day following the landings, 9 September, the Spanish Military Office in Sūq al-Thalathā' of Banū Bū Bakar in the al-Maṭālsa reported that the people in the Rifi controlled area of the tribe had not yet heard of the landings.² The Spanish doubtless told them fairly soon, but the fact that the news had not travelled quickly, despite the telephone service, which passed on information very rapidly, indicates that the Rifi authorities' control of information was as tight as ever.

In fact, bin 'Abd al-Karīm tried very hard to limit the spread of the bad news. He quickly prohibited the use of the telephone, and announced that all communications were to be carried out by letter³ --presumably to make it easier to censor news. On 12 September he banned any discussion of the landings in public.⁴

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 28, Hojas Diarias Beni Walishak, Hoja diaria, 8 Sept. 1925.

² SHM Melilla Leg. 28, Hojas de Confidentes Matalsa, nota, 9 Sept. 1925.

³ Ibid., Salāḥ b. Muḥammad, 11 Sept. 1925.

⁴ SHM Melilla Leg. 28, Oficina de Matalsa, Hoja diaria, 12 Sept. 1925.

Apart from the immediate "blanket" which he placed on the landings, bin 'Abd al-Karīm also took positive propagandising steps of his own. He gave further promises of outside help from a European nation--without specifying which one--which would soon come to the aid of the Rif.¹ He also engaged in black propaganda against the Spanish, and caused it to be announced in the markets that people who had made contact with Spain had been deceived by Spanish money, that Spain would never forgive the Rifis for the defeats of 1921, and if they succeeded in occupying the Rif they would kill the Rifis and their families. A good Muslim, he said, should die defending his land, and not live "like a dog". For his part, bin 'Abd al-Karīm said, he would rather kill himself than fall into Christian hands.² Such propaganda was given some substance by the real behaviour of the Spanish forces. Repeated stories of atrocities committed by Spanish troops were reported by Walter Harris, The Times correspondent in Tangier, in private communications to his paper. On 30 September he wrote to his Foreign Editor, Harold Williams, that a British Consular agent in Tetuan, Mr. Todd, had told him that of a group of 140 Rifis recently captured at Alhucemas, "15 were kept alive to give information. The rest were killed by the troops."³ Two weeks later Harris wrote again:

"The Spanish are impossible to work with--they are jealous, mean, and untruthful and cruel, and carry out reprisals on every possible occasion. The frontier tribes refuse to submit to them, but express their readiness to do so to the French."¹

¹ SHM Melilla, Leg. 28, Hojas de Confidentes Matalsa, Muqaddam b. 'Amar, 16 Sept. 1925.

² Ibid., Salāh b. Muḥammad Ḥammūsh, 17 Sept. 1925.

³ TAHF file, The Times Correspondence, Harris to Williams, Tangier, 30 Sept. 1925.

On 26 October he telegraphed: "British officers arriving from Alhucemas report Spaniards continue to kill decapitate prisoners."² The decapitation of prisoners was probably the most shocking aspect of this behaviour. Harris even obtained a photograph of members of the Foreign Legion holding up the severed heads of Moroccans killed during action around the post of Qudīa Tahar on the Tetuan front,³ a photograph which Primo de Rivera--who was apparently angry about the atrocities and tried to stop them--admitted was quite genuine.⁴

This behaviour was not, of course, the official policy of the Spanish army, and the military leadership made strenuous efforts to prevent it. Those responsible seem to have been mainly members of the Foreign Legion and the Moroccan Regulares of the Spanish army. Nevertheless, it could only encourage the Rifis and their supporters to further resistance.

The resistance was indeed fierce, and it took the Spanish troops a month to occupy a fairly small beachhead in Alhucemas. They were opposed, initially, by the 5,000 men in the Alhucemas area. This figure was soon increased. A few days after the landings, bin 'Abd al-Karīm ordered "everyone" on the French front to defend the northern coast. The Banū Tūzīn reportedly sent 500 men to defend Sidi Idris in the Timsamān, and 1,000 to the Ajdir region, the Gaznaya at least 500 to Ajdir, and the Marnisa 1,200 to the same.

¹ Ibid., Harris to Williams, Tangier, 13 Oct. 1925.

² Ibid., Telegram, Harris to Times, 26 Oct. 1925, Confidential.

³ Ibid., Telegram, Harris to Times, 17 Sept. 1925.

⁴ Ibid., Harris to Williams, 15 Nov. 1925, Confidential.

area.¹ At the same time all men over the age of 15 were ordered to join the ḥarka, while the women and children were sent to the interior. All camels, mules and donkeys were requisitioned.² Furthermore, bin 'Abd al-Karīm released all the prisoners held in the Banū Waryaghal lands, and ordered them to fight.³ Even al-Ḥājj bil-Qīsh was released from detention in late September, on the condition that he went home to the Gaznaya to form a ḥarka. His son, however, was kept behind in the Banū Waryaghal as a hostage.⁴ In the Banū Waryaghal itself, it was announced that anyone who joined the new ḥarka would be paid 2,000 pesetas, and at Sūq al-Aḥad of Rūādī in the Buqquya tribe all the men attending the market were drafted into the ḥarka--there were 3,000 of them, of whom 1,000 were unarmed.⁵

This does not mean that there was not opposition to the formation of yet more ḥarkas, but such opposition was confined to areas close to the French front, and on the eastern front where political contacts with the Spanish had existed ever since the reoccupation of the forward positions in 1922. Here the effects of the bad behaviour of Spanish troops was not felt, because by and large there was relatively little fighting in the area, even during the Alhucemas operation. Thus only a few days after the landings, the Banū Tūzīn refused any further ḥarkas and did not attend the markets in order to avoid being conscripted by members of

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 28, Hojas de Confidentes Matalsa, Faqīh 'Abdallah b. Ḥāmid, 13 Sept. 1925.

² Ibid., Muḥammad b. 'Amar, 14 Sept. 1925.

³ Ibid., Salāḥ b. Muḥammad, 11 Sept. 1925.

⁴ SHM Melilla Leg. 28, Información y Confidencias Tafersit y Beni Tuzin, Muḥammad b. al-Ḥājj Ḥammu, 27 Sept. 1925.

⁵ Ibid., Qā'id Zaghud (of Bū Ḥafūra), 17 Sept. 1925.

the Rīfī regular army.¹ The Banū Tūzīn were still refusing men on 17 September and the Timsamānīs also showed signs of being most unwilling to provide them.²

At the beginning of October the first real trouble started in the Rīfī dominated area of the Tafarsit tribe, which refused to obey bin 'Abd al-Karīm's orders to attack the Spanish. A regular army group which was sent to restore order was ejected from the tribe. The rebels were apparently led by Wuld al-Ḥassan,³ the Tafarsitī who, in June 1923, had shot Idrīs b. Sa'īd, the Moroccan from Salé who had negotiated the release of Spanish prisoners of war.⁴ On 5 October the Rīfī qā'id in the Tafarsit fled to the mountains because the local people wanted to hand him over to the Spanish.⁵ On the same day a similar rebellion broke out in the Gaznaya tribe.⁶ Bil-Qīsh apparently promised to put the rebellion down, although, as the Spanish realised, bin 'Abd al-Karīm could hardly take his old antagonist's promise very seriously.⁷ The Gaznaya were by now beginning to submit to the French in considerable numbers. What happened next is unclear. Hart--who puts the dates somewhat too late--says that Bil-Qīsh was poisoned on bin 'Abd al-Karīm's instructions, while his son was "quietly disposed of" in the Wednesday market of Tawrirt in the Banū Waryaghāl.⁸ A Spanish informant

¹ Ibid., 'Abd al-Ṣadiq b. 'Abd al-Ush (sic) (Tafarsit), 13 Sept. 1925.

² Ibid., 'Amarūsh b. Ḥaddu b. al-Muqaddam, 17 Sept. 1925.

³ Ibid., 'Amarūsh, 2 Oct. 1925.

⁴ See above, p. 605

⁵ SHM Melilla Leg. 28, Información y Confidencias Tafarsit y Beni Tuzin, 'Amarūsh, 5 Oct. 1925.

⁶ Ibid., Zaghdud, 5 Oct. 1925.

⁷ Ibid., Muḥammad b. al-Ḥājj Ḥammu, 11 Oct. 1925.

⁸ Hart, Aith Waryaghar, p. 399. He puts the date as early 1926, but this is clearly too late in the light of this new evidence.

on 19 October reported that Bil-Qīsh was killed by a bomb, with no reference to bin 'Abd al-Karīm's involvement.¹ Whatever the method used, and whether or not the murder of Bil-Qīsh was carried out on the direct instructions of Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Karīm, his death was extremely useful for the Rīfī leader, for the rebellion in the Gaznaya quickly died down.

Both the Tafarsit and the Gaznaya were in border areas of the Rīf, and as such more likely to fall prey to French and Spanish influence. The Spanish were less successful in their attempts to carry out a similar policy in the Banū Waryaghal, after their occupation of part of that tribe, but because the contacts they made during the autumn of 1925 were of importance later, a brief account of them is now given.

Sulaymān al-Khaṭṭābī and the Political Action in the Banū :

Waryaghal

When, in the period immediately before the Rīf war, in May 1921, General Berenguer had undertaken a tour of inspection of the Rīf coast, a number of Waryaghals had gone to Alhucemas Island to see him. One of these was Sulaymān b. al-Mujāhid of the Banū Zarā' sub-clan of the Banū Yūsif W-'Alī in the Banū Waryaghal, a distant cousin of bin 'Abd al-Karīm. Bin 'Abd al-Karīm had tried to fine all those who visited the island, and all except Sulaymān paid up. Sulaymān fled to Alhucemas Island, where he remained throughout the war.²

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 28, Información y Confidencias Tafarsit Beni Tuzin, 'Allāl b. Muḥammad b. A'isha, 19 Oct. 1925.

² See above, pp. 293-294.

On the Spanish occupation of Ajdir, Sulaymān b. al-Mujāhid al-Khaṭṭābī was at once reinstated in his property in the village,¹ and became the chief Rifi representative of the Spanish military authorities. His job was to make political contacts in the Buqquya and Banū Waryaghal tribes, to collect information and encourage submission to the Spanish. In this latter function he was not very successful. The Spanish occupied only a very small part of the territory of the two tribes, and even those people who were inclined to submit felt that it was too dangerous to do so.² On 3 October Sulaymān wrote a letter to be distributed to the Banū Waryaghal, Buqquya, Timsamān and Banū Tūzin. Part of this letter ran as follows:

"Spain is a mother to all those who are friendly towards her and the proof of this is that those who live under her protection want for nothing, neither do they suffer in any way. I tell you that Spain only wants peace and well-being for you. Take no notice of those who say that Spain punishes and mistreats Muslims, for they are ignorant people, and seek only evil and misfortune for you and your children, and perhaps your ruin."³

Few people took much notice, with one very important exception, Muḥ Azarqān of the Banū Bū 'Ayyāsh. (This man should not be confused with Muḥammad Azarqān, the Rifi Minister for Foreign Affairs.) This Muḥ Azarqān had been appointed as qā'id of the Banū Bū 'Ayyāsh in 1922 by bin 'Abd al-Karīm.⁴ He had never been particularly distinguished for his loyalty, however.

In the period immediately following the proclamation of bin

¹ The Times, 3 Oct. 1925, p. 10, dated Tangier, 2 Oct. 1925.

² SHM Melilla Leg. 27, Información de Alhucemas, Telegram, Comandante Jefe Oficina Información to Cor. Inspector-Gral. Interv., 3 Oct. 1925, Urgentísimo.

³ Ibid., Letter from Sulaymān al-Khaṭṭābī to the Tribes of Benī Uriaguel, Bokoia, Tamsamam and Benu Tuzin, Alhucemas, 3 Oct. 1925 (Spanish version only available).

⁴ See above, p. 498.

'Abd al-Karīm in January 1923, he was one of the signatories of a letter to the Spanish promising to help them if they advanced.¹ While the Rifis had little to fear from the Spanish, bin 'Abd al-Karīm, who was well aware of the propensity of the Banū Bū 'Ayyāsh to rebel, contented himself with keeping the situation under control. For the time being Muḥ Azarqān was tolerated, presumably in order not to cause more trouble with his clan. However, when the situation got dangerous, in the summer of 1925, Muḥ Azarqān was dismissed, along with three other Bū 'Ayyāshī qā'ids.²

When Sulaymān al-Khaṭṭābī became the Spanish representative in Ajdīr, Muḥ Azarqān quickly made contact and, encouraged by Sulaymān, sent a party which included his son, 'Amar and a Tūzānī, to Melilla on his behalf. Bin 'Abd al-Karīm decided finally to deal with Muḥ Azarqān and arrested him and his son.³ This was by no means the end of the story, for Muḥ Azarqān caused a good deal of trouble for bin 'Abd al-Karīm in the final stages of the Rif war, in the spring of 1926. For the moment, however, the incipient plot had been crushed.

In fact, despite the Spanish landings, the authority of bin 'Abd al-Karīm was still indisputable. The command chain and organs of government still functioned, and the political and social control of the Rif continued.

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 22, Cartas Arabes, 2, Bani Waryaghal, Muḥammad Azarqān, Ḥaddu b. Muḥammad Amzziyan, Misa'ūd b. al-Shaliwī al-Waryaghli, Muḥammad b. 'Amar Akhaṭṭ, Aḥmad b. 'Amar and 'Abd al-Salām b. Sidi Aḥmad Abirkān to Coronel of Melilla, 12 Jumāda II 1341/30 Jan. 1923.

² See above, p. 754.

³ Al-Bū 'Ayyāshī, op. cit., Vol. II, pp. 440-441.

The Operation of the Rifi Government after the Landings

The government structure set up by bin 'Abd al-Karīm after his proclamation in 1923 had had among its aims the abolition of violence and feuding in the Rif, and the imposition of a central authority. Both these aims continued to be carried out during the period after the landings.

Firstly, the central control became if anything closer and more centralised. In the months preceding the landings bin 'Abd al-Karīm had concentrated more and more power in his hands and those of his immediate family and supporters. This tendency continued after the landings. The policy of disarming the tribes continued. In the second week of October the Banū Yiṭṭuft tribe was disarmed.¹ A deserter from the Rifi regular army--a Waryaghli from the Banū 'Abdallah--reported that members of the regular army were disarmed before they went on leave.² This may have been partly to ensure that as many rifles as possible were available for use, but the evidence of another informant shows that this was not by any means the only or even the major reason. In the period just before the landings, bin 'Abd al-Karīm had set up "guards" (maḥakmas) in each tribe and announced that as there were no Christians in the area and he was responsible for order, it was not necessary for individuals to own guns, and, therefore, they should all hand them in at the maḥakmas. The implication was that bin 'Abd al-Karīm saw the private possession of arms as a direct assault on his own authority.¹

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 27, Información de Alhucemas, T.O. Com. Jefe Of. Interv. to Gral. Jefe Sector de Ajdir, Alhucemas, 12 Oct. 1925, "Urgente".

² Ibid., 'Abd al-Salām b. 'Amar b. 'Abd al-Karīm, 29 Nov. 1925.

The disarmament was certainly one aspect of the campaign to maintain order. The other aspect was the general knowledge that murderers would be punished. The execution of murderers also continued, at least into the first months of 1926. In March, a man from the Banū Bū Silmān was condemned to death--he had admitted to the murder of another man from the Banū Wanjil, in order to marry the dead man's wife. The evidence of witnesses was taken, and sentence was passed on him in order to deter others, as the judgement explained.²

By and large these policies--disarmament and capital punishment--kept the peace in the Rif very adequately even after the Spanish landings and resultant blow to morale. There were exceptions, however, including a particularly violent blood feud which broke out in the Banū Tūzin and Banū Waryaghāl in October and November, in which at least 14 people were killed. This was, as Spanish Military Intelligence pointed out with some glee, the first feuding since bin 'Abd al-Karīm took control in the Rif.³ It seems to have died out--or more likely was suppressed, although there is no confirmation of this--fairly quickly, for there are no further mentions of feuding in Spanish files until the final days of the war and the collapse of the Rifi state.

Evidence of the strength of the rule of law in

¹ Ibid.

² MAEF, Maroc 519, p. 45. Declaration in the case of Aḥmad b. 'Alī b. Aḥmad b. 'Umar, and on reverse his condemnation to death for murder, signatures illegible, 25 Sha'bān 1344/10 mar. 1926.

³ SHM Melilla Leg. 28, Información y Confidencias Tafersit y Beni Tuzin, Muḥammad b. al-Ḥājj Ḥammu (Igharbiin, Banū Tūzin), 8 Nov. 1925.

the Rif, even as late as March and April 1926, is provided by a Swedish newspaper correspondent, Alexander Langlet, who visited the Rif during those months for the Manchester Guardian.¹ Langlet wrote:

"Abdel Krim's authority seemed to be absolute, and his laws--for example, against tribal and family feuds--seem to be kept. You can sleep on the road in the Riff, which you can do neither in the French nor in the Spanish zone."²

Certainly bin 'Abd al-Karim does not appear to have lost his own self-confidence in the days after the Spanish landing. Vincent Sheean, the American correspondent who had visited the Rif in 1924, returned again in 1925, at the height of the battle for Ajdir in late September. According to him, bin 'Abd al-Karim had in fact gained in self-confidence since their previous meeting. He was less formal, and totally unconcerned of the danger from the Spanish aeroplanes. He expounded his demand for the absolute independence of the Rif while standing in the mouth of a cave, firing a rifle at low flying Spanish bombers.³ On 23 September, Sheean wrote in his diary:

"His courage is magnificent. His ideas have not changed, have even been reinforced by the present danger. From what I saw of him today I know that I had no idea of him before. He has a grandeur, added to by the circumstances of horror and great danger. But in spite of this he is humorous, funny: makes me laugh, especially when he assumes a school-masterish air and corrects my Spanish."⁴

¹ Furneaux (op. cit., p. 220) states that Langlet visited the Rif from Dec. 1925 to Feb. 1926. He is without doubt incorrect. Furneaux is frequently at error both in detail and in general. On this occasion he gives Langlet's name as "Langret" and appears to ignore Langlet's own assertion that "I have just reached London after two months with the Riffs" in the Manchester Guardian, 29 Apr. 1926, p. 9.

² Ibid.

³ Sheean, Personal History, pp. 149-151.

⁴ Ibid., p. 152.

That is not to say that bin 'Abd al-Karim underestimated the problems that faced the Rifi state, and the importance of maintaining the confidence of the Rifis themselves. To this end, from mid-October onwards he conducted an intense propaganda campaign, in an attempt to encourage his people.

Propaganda

The propaganda campaign in the Rif had three main aspects--promises of outside help, promises that France and Spain would soon withdraw from the Rif because of pressure within their own countries, and a return to a call for jihād.

Promises of outside help were not new in the propaganda of the Rif war. Once again, the main focus of hope was the old First World War alliance of Germany and Turkey against France--a hope which might be expected to have a greater chance of realisation after the victories of Mustafa Kemal in Turkey. In mid-October, bin 'Abd al-Karim paraded four men, whom he described as "Germans" who had come to help him, on the Ajdir front. The rumour quickly spread that very soon German troops would disembark at Sidī Idrīs (in the Timsamān) or elsewhere, to help fight the Spanish.¹ Bin 'Abd al-Karim followed this rumour with another one to the effect that Germany and Turkey had both declared war on France.² In November, this theme was varied slightly. It was announced in the sūqs that the French were unable to advance because they owed money to the British government, which had to be paid immediately, or the British would refuse any more credit for further advances. Furthermore, if the loan was not repaid the British would take over the city of Oran in Algeria as payment.¹ This was a remarkably complex piece of propaganda, and shows some awareness of the intricacies of European politics--even if it was quite untrue.

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 28, Información y Confidencias Tafersit y Beni Tuzin, 'Allāl b. Muḥammad b. 'Aisha, 19 Oct. 1925.

² SHM Melilla Leg. 27, Información de Alhucemas, nota, 21 Oct. 1925.

Indeed, the internal pressures on the European allies, France and Spain, for an end to the war were quite well known to the Rifi government, and accordingly were used in propaganda. At the end of December a letter from bin 'Abd al-Karim was read in the markets of the Jibāla, referring to:

"... the financial difficulties in which France finds herself because of the need to repay America, the hostility of the [French] people to the campaigns in Morocco and against the Druzes [in Syria], and the probable refusal of credits to continue the war."²

The opposition of France to the war in Morocco came, naturally, from the Left, and was indeed severe enough. In the Parliament the Prime Minister, Painlevé, was attacked, in October, for the heavy costs and loss of life in Morocco.³ Outside Parliament, Communist militants carried on a fierce campaign against the war.⁴ Other stories which appeared in the French press in Morocco, to the effect that the British government wanted an independent Rifi state, were bemoaned by Walter.

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 28, Información y Confidencias Tafersit y Beni Tuzin, Zaghdūd, 8 Nov. 1925.

² SHAT Maroc Rif 8, Groupement de Fez du 15 Novembre 1925 au . . . 13 Juillet 1926, C.M.T. Fez, 31 Dec. 1926.

³ The losses up till 15 October were 2,178 killed and 8,297 wounded. 158,000 men were involved in military operations at a total cost of some 1,350,000,000 francs. Paul Isoart, "La gueree du Rif et le Parlement Français", in Colloque, pp. 303-204.

⁴ In November 1925, 125 members of the French Communist Party had been imprisoned and 263 were wanted in connection with offences committed while opposing the war. Robert Charvin, "Le Parti Communiste français face à la guerre du Rif", in Colloque, p. 226.

Harris, The Times correspondent: ". . . they merely encourage futile hopes among the Rifis, and 'Abd-el-Krīm himself uses the French newspaper articles as propaganda among his tribesmen."¹ The third aspect of this propaganda was a call for jihād. This seems mainly to have been directed against those Moroccans who were fighting for the Spanish. For instance, in February 1926 a certain Qā'id al-Mallāli, who may have been a member of the important pro-Spanish Mallāli family of Alcazarquivir, received the following letter from bin 'Abd al-Karīm:

"Praise be to God Alone--God's blessing be on our Lord Muḥammad and his family.

To the Kaid Sid El-Mellali, God's peace and blessing be upon you. And then:

We know that you love and believe in your religion and that you hate the enemy. This is not remarkable, for it is the duty of every Muslim, for the world is a dream and its products . . . [sic].

Do you know what God has ordained for those who are treacherous or work under the authority of the enemy? The Corān [sic] said 'Oh! Believers, you shall not ally yourselves with Jews or Christians nor take them for protectors unless you are physically weak.' The tradition of the Prophet says 'Those who live under the protection of unbelievers will be separated from me.'

We are astonished to see you allied with the enemy and under his authority. Do you not know that he is now broken and powerless and seeks your help? Why does he use you in the front lines against the Muslims? So that you should die outside your religion. He keeps his people in the rear lines and you are deceived by it. . . .

What answer do you have to what we have done to the [enemy's] armies when they occupied our land? We have done what is required by our religion and the defence of our own ideas and customs. What prevents you from refusing him [i.e., the enemy] the harkas which you now give him to fight against your brothers? Do you believe that his forces are greater than ours?

I swear by the one God that his forces are inferior to ours! What is happening that you should sacrifice your lives and souls outside the Muslim religion? There is no greater disgrace nor more infamous vice! Is there none amongst you who walks the straight path of truth? How will you excuse yourself before God? What will you reply on the day of resurrection?

¹ The Times, 29 Mar. 1926, p. 14, dated Marrakesh, 28 Mar. 1926.

We advise and demand the unity which God laid down to defend the holy religion and in this cause we offer our fortunes and our lives. Who will answer that he will come over to our side to fight against the enemy and will help us?

For our part we are willing to provide everything that is necessary once you begin the task. Let us throw the enemy from our land. Let us carry the worthy standard of victory and the shield of glory and freedom which can be won but not given.

[Even] if you close your ears so that you do not hear our voices and that which God has laid down, and you do the contrary setting aside prestige, we will [still] have carried out God's command by showing you the path of the Merciful, who is our witness.

You know, having been told it, that our warriors have taken much of the riches of the enemy as booty in great battles. We have not lost hope that you will know all about our victories and those which the glorious army of God must achieve [in the future].

I repeat my appeal to you that you should brush away the dust that clouds your judgement. Unsheath your arms against our enemies; do not fear his now-exhausted strength, do not listen to his lies and deceits, which serve only to confuse you that you should not know the truth. They have said that they have occupied Ajdir, whereas in fact they occupied only a few stones on its outskirts.

When we saw them arrive there we rejoiced and were happy, for we knew that all would then belong to us. we rejoice each time they advance, because their losses increase in killed and wounded.

Those who are experienced in war know that the enemy is overstretching his forces on land and sea, and will have to retreat with terrible consequences for him.

Believe in victory and the glory of God which are inseparable from him who fights [for the faith].

God is our protector, our help against the enemy who wishes to expel us from our houses and dishonour our mosques!

You should know that the believers are daily in greater harmony and their situation gets better despite the forces the enemy sends by land and sea. The Coran--the sacred word--says 'the believers promised and accepted the word in sincerity, some of them are dead and some still to come, etc.'

And so, it is necessary to annihilate the enemy and make him submit to the truth, and respect our rights, by whatever method.

Do you want us to live without rights or to die in agony?

God give you good judgement. And Peace.

Mohamed Ben Ab-el-Krim [sic] el-Jatabi."¹

This letter marks a return to traditionalist propaganda. Here there is no reference to the advantages of an ordered, Islamic state, it simply repeats the vague promises that the Spanish would have to withdraw, and concentrates on the religious nature of the struggle, berating Mallālī for his treachery to his faith and not to his waṭan. Even more distinct calls for jihād in the old style were made in letters sent by Sī Maḥammad to the Anti-Atlas region south of Marrakesh in the south of Morocco, where Marrabī Rabūḥ, a son of Mā'al-'Ainīn, was carrying on the war against the French. The recipients of these letters, all dated 5 Jumāda I 1344/21 November 1925, were ten of the most important leaders in the area, including Marrabī Rabūḥ himself, his brother Muḥammad b. Mā'al-'Ainīn, and Madanī bin al-Ṭālib Aḥmad al-Aksāssī, qā'id of the Akhsas tribe, and one of Rabūḥ's most powerful supporters.² The letter to al-Akhsāssī is ¹ Spanish translation of a letter from bin 'Abd al-Karīm to Qā'id Sī al-Mallālī, in B.N.E.S. de A., Miscellanea García Figueras, Vol. XLII (no page numbers). The translation only is given, with a clearly erroneous date--"Aydir 13-2-25" (sic). As the letter refers to the Spanish having already occupied part of Ajdīr, which they had not done in Feb. 1925, it seems reasonable from the context to infer that this was a misprint (the translation is typed) for 13-2-26.

² Other recipients were the Faqīh Sīdī al-Ḥājj al-Abad, the main propagandist against the French in the south, Qā'id Mubarak al-Bin Irāmī, an ally of Madānī al-Akhsāssī, Muḥammad b. al-Bashīr, son of a leader of the tribe of Sabula (in the Ait Bā 'Amrān), Sa'id b. Aḥmad al-Kardūssī of the Ida Ū Baqil tribe, and Qā'id Nujīm al-Akhsāssī. Translations of all these letters were forwarded, along with a covering letter, in SHAT Maroc E24, Propagande Riffain, Blanc. (Delegate of Resident-General in Morocco) to Ministre des Affaires Etrangères, Rabat, 24 D3c. 1925. The Ait Bā 'Amrān confederacy was centred around the Spanish-claimed colony of Ifni, assigned to Spain in the 1860 treaty on the supposed site of Santa Cruz typical:

"Try as hard as possible to fight the unbelievers, so that the word of God may triumph and so as to help your friends, although we are far apart . . . The moment has come when the warriors for the faith must show themselves, and throw light on their deeds . . . Know that our purpose is to throw out the unbelievers and purify the Muslim lands of their presence, so as to set up a free Islamic government in Morocco. Then it will be possible to revive the precepts of our religion in a perfect way . . ." ¹

All these letters, and that to al-Mallālī, appeal to their recipients to wage holy war, although the letters sent to the Moroccan south-west are the more explicit. Clearly bin 'Abd al-Karīm and his brother felt the need to try to weaken their enemies, France and Spain, by encouraging defection and renewed attacks on them in other quarters. The propaganda vehicle they used was the one most suited to the occasion, a call to fulfil religious duties which might be conceived as more effective than, say, vague promises of German support, which Mallālī could have known were untrue, and which to Marrabī Rabūḥ might have less appeal than Islamic solidarity.

The reason for this desire to put pressure on the European allies in other directions is not hard to see. Although bin 'Abd al-Karīm maintained control in the Rif, the economic and military problems were getting worse. Similar forms of propaganda were used within the Rif itself. Bin 'Abd al-Karīm himself later described how, after the Spanish landing at Ālhucemas, he had used a story--which de Mar Pequeña (see above, p. 69), so these recipients could be said to be in a position similar to that of the Rifis, in that they faced a threat both from French and Spanish colonialism.

¹ Maḥammad b. 'Abd al-Karīm to Qā'id Madanī al-Akhsāssi, 13 Nov. 1925, contained in package mentioned above in p. 792, n. 2.

according to him was ~~that~~^{true}--that the Spanish had turned a mosque in Alhucemas into a stable, as a tactic which "doubled the bravery of the fighters, and increased their devotion to myself and my cause."¹

The Economic Situation

The essence of the economic problems of the RIF after the Spanish landing at Alhucemas, and the French advance in the south, is very simple: in short, the RIF ran out of food. The reasons are not hard to find. Firstly the intensified blockade of the coast and eastern front, and the French occupation of the southern RIF, cut off food supplies from outside. Secondly, the harvests failed.

To deal with this latter part first, a graph of rainfall in 1925 and 1926 shows that between January and March 1926, when the growing crops needed water, the rainfall was very low indeed (Table XIII: 1).² In the autumn of 1925, grain had been relatively cheap. A detailed picture is not available, because the figures are lacking, but there are pointers. At the beginning of October barley was only 2 pts a mudd,³ a low figure indeed, compared with the prices of a year before--12 pts a mudd in October 1924.⁴ In November the prices did creep back to their 1924 levels--12 pts a mudd⁵--but it was not until the beginning of January that

¹ Article in al-Manār, p. 632.

² Table XIII:1 is derived from Resumen de las Observaciones, 1924-1926.

³ SHM Melilla Leg. 28, Información y Confidencias Tafersit y Beni Tuzin, 2 Oct. 1925.

⁴ See above, p. 644.

⁵ SHM Melilla Leg. 27, Información de Alhucemas, 'Abd al-Salām b. 'Amar b. 'Abd al-Karīm b. 'Abdallah (Banū Waryaghal), 29 Nov. 1925.

Table XIII: I

Rainfall at Melilla 1924 to 1926.

prices began to rise sharply. There were two factors responsible for this: firstly the lack of rain, and secondly the disruption caused by Spanish and French bombing attacks, which prevented the Rifis from cultivating their lands. Because of the aeroplanes, people tried to spend as much time as possible in shelters below ground and came out only at night. By January much of the land was uncultivated and, according to French army prisoners who escaped from the Rifis, famine had overcome the region.¹ Barley, which remained fairly low (15-18 pts a mudd) until the last week in February, more than doubled in price between 24 and 28 February. Although it came down thereafter, it never fell much below 30 pts a mudd (Table XIII: 2).² It is interesting to compare these prices with those in the Kabdāna and Awlād Siṭṭūt tribes in a Spanish occupied zone. Here the prices showed much less variation, and although they remained very much the same as the prices in the Rif during January and February, and even peaked slightly in late February, just as those in the Rif did, they did not undergo the same

¹ SHAT Maroc Riff, 3 I, Interrogatoires des Indigènes, St. Muḥammad bin Brāhim, Fez, Jan. 1926, and Tirrailleux Mūsā bin Aḥmad, Fez, Jan. 1926.

² Table 2 is derived from:

- (a) Melilla Leg. 30, Oficina de Información de Dar Mizian, Ḥamid b. al-Bashir 'Allāl, 18 Jan. 1926.
- (b) Ibid., Ḥamid b. al-Bashir 'Allāl, 24 Feb. 1926.
- (c) Ibid., Muḥammad b. Abariāq, 28 Feb. 1926.
- (d) SHM Melilla Leg. 30, Oficina de Información de Tafarsit, Khalifa 'Amarūsh, 3 Mar. 1926.
- (e) SHM Melilla Leg. 30, Oficina de Información de Drius, Muḥammad b. al-Mukhtār, 15 Mar. 1926.
- (f) Ibid., Muḥammad b. 'Amar, 29 Mar. 1926.
- (g) Ibid., Muḥammad b. 'Amar, 30 Mar. 1926.

The details are not of course complete and concern a number of markets. There were doubtless local variations. Nevertheless, there is considerable consistency and the general trend is quite clear.

January 1926
 February 1926
 March 1926
 Present wheat and barley in R.R. zone Towson - March 1926

7b7

Price in Sp. Pesetas

Barley Per mudd in Rifi zone

Barley Per mudd in Spanish zone

5 10 15 20 25 30 | 5 10 15 20 25 30

April 1926

May 1926

Table III - 4: Prices in Rifi and Spanish zones April-May 1926 enormous increases in March (Table XIII: 3).¹ This is a clear indication of the growing effectiveness of the blockade. By April and May prices in the Riff zone were running consistently at about 50% higher on average than those in the Spanish-occupied zone (Table XIII: 4).²

The worst problem of all was to find enough salt. As the French advanced into the Gaznaya, they cut off the supplies which had previously come from that tribe. Bin 'Abd al-Karīm tried to encourage smuggling of salt from the Spanish zone, which could be sent to a central point for distribution.³ As the spring drew on salt got more and more expensive and finally, after the end of April, disappeared altogether.⁴ In fact, food in general had run out by this time. On 30 April a Spanish informant reported that people were going three or four days without food. Others had no clothes.⁵

Not surprisingly, these terrible economic conditions affected the will of many of the Rifis to fight. Nevertheless, bin 'Abd al-Karīm did not finally lose control

¹ Table 3 is derived from SHM Melilla Leg. 30, Oficina de Información de Zaio, Hojas Diarias, 11 Jan. 1926, 13 Jan. 1926, 15 Jan. 1926, 28 Jan. 1926, 8 Feb. 1926, 14 Feb. 1926, 21 Feb. 1926, 28 Feb. 1926, 11 Mar. 1926, 14 Mar. 1926, 21 Mar. 1926, 28 Mar. 1926.

² Table 4 is derived from:

(a) SHM Melilla Leg. 30, Oficina de Beni Walishak, Ḥāmid b. al-Bashīr, 'Allāl, 4 Apr. 1926.

(b) Ibid., 'Abd al-Salām b. 'Amar, 10 Apr. 1926.

(c) Ibid., 'Amar b. al-Muqaddam, 10 Apr. 1926.

(d) SHM Melilla Leg. 30, Oficina de Khemis de Beni Bu Ifrur,

(e) SHM Melilla Leg. 30, Oficina de Intervención de Beni Ulichek, Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Salām, 11 May 1926.

³ SHM Melilla Leg. 30, Oficina de Información de Dar Mizian, Ḥāmid b. al-Bashīr 'Allāl, 30 Jan. 1926.

⁴ SHAT Maroc Riff, 3 I, Interrogatoires des Indigènes évadés du Rif, Capt. Clerget, Taza, 29 May 1926.

⁵ SHM Melilla Leg. 30, Oficina de Información de Tafersit, Mimūn b. Zaghdūd, 30 Apr. 1926.

until French and Spanish forces actually penetrated right into the heart of the Rif. He maintained his authority by the use of more and more violent dictatorial methods.

The Effort to Keep Control

Bin 'Abd al-Karīm faced two problems in late 1925 and early 1926: to prevent tribes on the front lines against the French and Spanish from submitting to the Allies and to prevent subversion within the Rif.

On the French front his principal enemy was his old opponent 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu, who was now working with the French at the head of irregular Moroccan forces. 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu's centre of operations naturally was his old power base in the Marnīsa and Sinhāja Srair tribes. At the beginning of September, bin 'Abd al-Karīm was reported to have shot 100 hostages from the Marnīsa, bin Ḥamīdu's tribe, in an effort to so terrorise that tribe that it would not join him.¹ On the eastern front, bin 'Abd al-Karīm promised a reward of 50 pts for anyone who reported another for visiting the Spanish zone.² In the Sinhāja a man was shot on the orders of the commander at Banū Barbar for encouraging defections to the French.³

Such repression was clearly not enough, and in the Sinhāja and Matīwa al-Jabal tribes large numbers of people began to submit to 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu. The Awlād Bū al-Hādī clan of the Matīwa al-Jabal joined him in the last week of

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 27, Información de Alhucemas, Com. Jefe Centro de Interv. Ajdir to Cmte. Gral. Melilla, 6 Dec. 1926.

² SHM Melilla Leg. 28, Información de Tafersit y Beni Tuzin, 'Amarūsh b. Ḥaddu al-Muqaddam, 8 Dec. 1925.

³ SHAT Maroc Rif 8, Groupement de Fez, 15 Novembre 1925 à 13 Juillet 1926, C.M.T. Fez, 10 dec. 1925.

December¹ and then at once proceeded to pursue a blood feud with members of a neighbouring clan. 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu took the opportunity provided by the confusion to move into the Fannāssa.²

At the beginning of January, bin 'Abd al-Karīm executed all his remaining hostages from the Marnīsa--the exact number is not given--except one.³ In the Mastāra, the entire population of a village fled to avoid punishment for not sending reinforcements.⁴ Nevertheless, bin 'Abd al-Karīm could not for long hold the line against defections. Towards the end of January, the Banū Waryajal tribe in the Sinhāja also started to submit to the French. There were problems in the Jibāla as well, where bin 'Abd al-Karīm ordered the replacement of Ṭālib al-Shawnī, the man who had originally been appointed as qā'id of the Banū Aḥmad after the Rifī capture of Shāwin, and later as qā'id of the western Jibālan tribes of Ahl Sharīf, Banū Sikkār, Banū Issaf and Sumāta. The Sumāta, his tribe, were furious and rose against the Rifīs. In the northern Jibāla, Akhrīrū was forced to deal with the Banū Masawar who were attacking the vital Tangier convoys. Nevertheless, the bulk of the Jibāla--Banū Ḥassan, Banū 'Arūs and Akhmās--were still loyal to the Rifīs and provided Akhrīrū with men.⁵ However, the slow trickling away of support on the southern front continued, despite bin

¹ Ibid., C.M.T. Fez, 21 Dec. 1925, and C.M.T. Fez, 26 Dec. 1925.

² MAEF, Maroc 520, 'Alī b. Ḥammu al-Naḏūrī al-Matīwī (Pasha of Matīwa for bin 'Abd al-Karīm) to bin 'Abd al-Karīm, 13 Jumāda II 1344/29 Dec. 1925.

³ SHAT Maroc Riff 8, Groupement de Fez, Novembre 1925-Juillet 1926, C.M.T. Fez, 5 Jan. 1926.

⁴ Ibid., C.M.T. Fez, 6 Jan. 1926.

⁵ Ibid., C.M.T. Fez, 25 Jan. 1926. For details of al-Ṭālib al-Shawnī's career, see above, pp. 695-696.

'Abd al-Karīm's efforts. His qā'id in the Jaya tribe surrendered on 30 January.¹ On 1 February the Rīfī qā'ids in the Matīwa al-Jabal fled because that tribe was no longer secure, but did not dare to return to the Rīf for fear of punishment. At the same time the Sumāta tribe started to arrest members of the Rīfī regular army in their territory.² However, the Rīfī command was still quite able to fight back, and Bū Laḥya arrived in the Jibāla in mid-February with around 1,000 men to deal with the rebellion in the Banū Sikkar and Banūr Gurfit.³ By 14 February he was in control and started to disarm the tribes.⁴ By the end of February the western Jibāla was quite definitely back under Rīfī control.⁵ Meanwhile the northern Sinhāja was largely kept loyal through the power and influence of the Akhamlīshīn.⁶

Matters were rather different in the Rīf. Here the absolute control of bin 'Abd al-Karīm was undisputed, and the government functioned normally. In an effort to deal with the food shortages, grain was stored at central points⁷--for instance at Sī 'Alī Bū 'Uqba--and guards were put on the silos.⁸ In order to replenish his army's depleted stocks of ammunition, bin 'Abd al-Karīm announced that he

¹ SHAT Maroc Riff 8, Groupement de Fez, Novembre 1925-Juillet 1926, SM.T. Fez, 30 Jan. 1926.

² Ibid., C.M.T. Fez, 1 Feb. 1926.

³ Ibid., C.M.T. Fez, 10 Feb. 1926, and C.M.T. Fez, 13 Feb. 1926.

⁴ Ibid., C.M.T. Fez, 14 Feb. 1926.

⁵ Ibid., C.T.O. Fez, 26 Feb. 1926.

⁶ Ibid., C.T.O. Fez, 23 Feb. 1926.

⁷ SHAT Maroc Riff 14, Dossier III Mars 1926, Renseignements donnés par Abd el-Krim el Hadj Ali el Boucoyyi, Tangier, 4 March 1926 (henceforth referred to as "Renseignements, Abd el-Krim el Hadj Ali").

⁸ SHM Melilla Leg. 30, Oficina de Información de Drius, 'Aisa b. 'Amar Akarrūsh, 4 Jan. 1926.

would pay for any unexploded bombs brought to him to be made into grenades.¹ Work continued on the road system; at the beginning of February a Spanish informant reported that a road was being built between Anwāl and Sūq al-Sabat of Banū Walishak.²

The administration also continued to work. The front line commanders continued to send regular reports to Ajdir. A typical one was sent from Tawārda at the beginning of January, and concerned movements of the Spanish Foreign Legion in the al-Maṭālsa, bombing raids by Spanish aeroplanes, and the crash of two of those aeroplanes near 'Azīb Miḡār, an argument over the possession of a rifle, the shelling of Spanish positions by Rifī guns, and so on.³

Strict records of the distribution of weapons were still kept. On 7 February, according to one slip preserved in the French Archives, there were 50 Khamsiya rifles handed out in the Zargāt tribe, and 18 in the Tisūl, and so on.⁴ This implies that the bureaucracy, at least, was still working. However, there were other problems.

One of the worst of these problems was that of finance, for money was slowly running out. The shortage of money was seen to be serious in December, when the regular army had its pay cut. The salary of machine gunners, for instance, went down from 60-80 pts to 40 pts a month.⁵ In

¹ Ibid., 'Aisa b. 'Amar Akarrūsh, 12 Jan. 1926.

² SHM Melilla Leg 30, Oficina de Información de Dar Mizian, Ḥāmid b. al-Bashīr 'Allāl, 2 Feb. 1926.

³ MAEF, Maroc 520, p. 187, Akhbār of Tawārda (beginning of Jan. 1926).

⁴ Ibid., p. 77, List of arms distributed to tribe, 24 Sha'bān 1344/7 Feb. 1926.

⁵ SHM Melilla Leg. 27, Información de Alhucemas, Ḥāmid b. Mūsā b. 'Alī (a native of Tripolitania captured by the Rifis), 1 Dec. 1925.

mid-January a Spanish informant reported that the troops were not being paid at all.¹ The troops were not the only employees of the Rifi government who were not paid. On 20 January 1926 one Sa'id b. al-Qā'id al-Sharīf wrote to bin 'Abd al-Karīm to complain that his mother who worked in "the bakery of the noble (al-sharīf)Makhzan" had not been paid for three months.²

By the beginning of March the situation was getting desperate both economically and politically. Prices of grain had increased greatly over a short period, and there was even no grass to feed the flocks, because the rains had not come.³ At the end of the first week of March, when people went to bin 'Abd al-Karīm to ask for money with which to buy cartridges, he replied that all the money given to him by Spain (in exchange for the prisoners) was now finished. There was no money left.⁴ At the same time, at the beginning of March, the Rifi cause suffered its first defection from the governing group itself. Sī 'Abd al-Karīm b. al-Ḥājj 'Alī of the Buqquya, a relative of Ra'īs Misa'ūd "Sibara" by marriage, and hence of bin 'Abd al-Karīm himself, and the Rifi spokesman in Tangier,⁵ went to the French representative in that city and told them that he was willing to work for them. He explained that since the death of his brother-in-law "Sibara", who was, according to him, killed by a servant

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 30, Oficina de Información de Tafersit, Muḥammad b. Sī Muḥand b. al-Ḥājj Qaddur, 18 Jan. 1926.

² MAEF, Maroc 519, p. 134, Sa'id b. al-Qā'id al-Sharīf to Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Karīm, 6 Rajab 1344/20 Jan. 1926. This document is reproduced in the appendix, No. 13.

³ SHM Melilla Leg. 30, Oficina de Información de Tafersit, Muḥammad 'Allāl Muḥand, 8 Mar. 1926.

⁴ Ibid., 'Amarūsh, 9 Mar. 1926.

⁵ For details of the career of 'Abd al-Karīm b. al-Ḥājj 'Alī, see above, pp. 161-162, 176.

of Muḥammad Azarqān, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, his position in the Rif had become impossible, and his only safety lay in "the friendship of Si M'hammed ben Abd el Krim who has always protected me."¹ So he decided to leave the Rif and take refuge in Tangier. Knowing that he would not be allowed to stay in the International Zone without the permission of the Spanish and French, he had decided to cooperate with the latter. He confirmed that the Rifi government no longer had any money to maintain the troops, and revealed that bin 'Abd al-Karīm's car could no longer be used because there was no petrol in the Rif.²

'Abd al-Karīm b. al-Ḥājj 'Alī also said that the al-Khaṭṭābī brothers and their uncle 'Abd al-Salām were determined to continue the war to the very end.³ However, by this time rumours were already circulating in the Rif that bin 'Abd al-Karīm was trying to negotiate a peace. Indeed he had already tried in January and February.

The Search for Peace

The effort in January and February for a negotiated peace to the conflict initially came from a rather unlikely quarter: Captain Robert Gordon Canning, one of the principal members of the Riff Committee in London.⁴ Canning was ¹ SHAT Maroc Riff 14, Dossier III Mars 1926, Renseignements, Abd el-Krim el Hadj Ali, Tangier, 4 Mar. 1926.

² Ibid.

³ Ibid.

⁴ The Riff Committee was set up in 1925 in London, and was composed of a number of Englishmen who expressed sympathies for the cause of Islamic Nationalism. Prominent among its members were Arthur Field, Captain Canning, and a Captain Gardiner. Field was a member of the British Communist Party and Secretary of the Anglo-Ottoman Society. He had been in contact with John Arnall, a pro-Rifi English resident in Tangier, when the latter visited the Rif in 1922 (see above, p. 510).

encouraged by remarks about autonomy for the Rif made by the French Prime Minister, Painlevé, in October 1925,¹ and having confirmed with Painlevé and his Foreign Minister Briand, and with Steeg, the French Resident-General in Rabat, that this meant internal self-government, he set out to try to convince bin 'Abd al-Karīm of the possibility of negotiation. It must be said that there were considerable differences of opinion between the French and Spanish leadership over this matter. The French were much more interested in negotiations than were the Spanish. The civilian Steeg had replaced General Lyautey as Resident-General on 28 September 1925 as a result of this desire. Steeg was a former Professor of Philosophy and a Radical-Socialist Canning had been an officer in the British army during the First World War, and was later connected with the Red Crescent in London (al-Bū 'Ayyāshī, op. cit., vol. II, p. 442). He later appeared in Palestine in November 1929 during the troubles between Jews and Arabs and proceeded to support the Arabs (Sheean, Personal History, pp. 411-412). Gardiner had set himself up in London in 1923 as "Minister-plenipotentiary from the Government of the Rif", from an office in the Strand. From here he wrote letters to a number of governments, inviting them to recognise the Rifi government and set up diplomatic representation in Ajdir. Recipients included the governments of Mexico and Rumania, who were understandably puzzled (MAEE, Antiquo Archivo 2543, carpeta VE 438, Marruecos Noticias sobre guerra, Letter, Gardiner to Government of Mexico, London, 29 Aug. 1923, and T.C. Amalfi (Sp. Minister, Bucarest) to Alba, Bucarest, 22 Sept. 1923). Gardiner's interest in the Rif was originally financial, and in June 1923 he signed a contract--which the Rifi government later denied--to provide a loan of £300,000 sterling in exchange for considerable commercial rights in the Rif. He would be allowed to set up a Bank, to develop mining, forestry, telephone and communications and a postal system, to build ports, schools and technical colleges, railways and tramways, and even theatres, cinemas and opera houses --FO 371/W9218/783/28, Clive to Ramsay MacDonald, Tangier, 10 Oct. 1924, and FO 371/W9483/783/28, Clive to MacDonald, Tangier, 27 Oct. 1924. Such plans were clearly pure fantasy, whether the document itself was genuine or not. In June 1926, after the fall of the Rif, Gardiner turned his attention to the Sūs, where he supplied arms to Madānī al-Akhsāssi (see above, p. 793), landing them from his yacht, the Silver Crescent (MAEE, Leg. R966, expediente 13, Sospechosos en Marruecos, Fr. Ambassador to Spain, to Minister of State, San Sebastián, 29 July 1926).

¹ Fleming, op. cit., p. 309.

Deputy, and he wished for a peaceful settlement although he quite properly emphasised that all negotiations had to be a joint French and Spanish undertaking.¹ The Spanish, and particularly Primo de Rivera, after the success of the landings at Alhucemas, were less inclined to negotiate with bin 'Abd al-Karīm. Both publicly and in private, Primo rejected any attempt at a pact with the Rifis.² In fact, Primo's opinions had changed from a desire to work for a negotiated settlement with the Rifi authorities, to a total refusal of any sort of negotiation, since he now realised that outright victory was within his grasp.³

Canning reached Targist sometime in January 1926, and after considerable discussion with Sī Maḥammad, Azarqān and later bin 'Abd al-Karīm himself, succeeded in working out a series of Rifi terms for a peace settlement. These terms included agreement that the Rif should have internal autonomy, but not independence, under the nominal authority of the Sultan, that there would be an open-door policy to European trade in the Rif, that the Rifi government would be responsible for internal order, but that it would not enter into relations with any foreign country; that the head of the government would be called the "Amīr"; that its capital would be Tetuan, but that Spain would be allowed to keep Ceuta, Melilla and Larache, although the Wargha tribes and some of the Jibāla tribes (i.e., in the French zone) should fall within the Rif.⁴

Not surprisingly, neither France nor Spain was ...

¹ Ibid., and Gabrielli, op. cit., pp. 167-168.

² Fleming, op. cit., pp. 311-312.

³ Ibid., pp. 313-314.

⁴ Al-Bū 'Ayyāshī, op. cit., Vol. II, pp. 443-444.

willing to give up such large parts of their Protectorates in this way, and when Canning reached Tangier at the end of January 1926, he was attacked by the French and Spanish press, and there were a series of complaints about him by Spanish and French officials to the international governing body of the city.¹ At the beginning of February, on the advice of British Consul-General Clive, Canning left Tangier.²

However, despite the failure of these plans for peace, some sort of an end to the war was desperately needed by the Rifis. The French and Spanish were quite prepared to carry on to a final defeat of the Rif. Primo, although determined to reduce the burden of the war on Spain, and to bring back some 36,000 men, mainly conscripts, from Morocco, kept an army of some 98,000 men--Spanish Foreign Legion, Spanish regular troops, and Moroccan Regulares--in the Protectorate.³ With these men he would pursue the war to the end.

On 4 February 1926, a French military delegation, including Pétain, the army commander in Morocco, arrived in Madrid to plan a spring campaign in the Rif. The French and Spanish decided on a series of operations, starting with a French advance on 15 April, and followed by Spanish offensives on the Ajdir and eastern fronts. Each side would guarantee to have at least 25,000 men ready for the operation.⁴

The Rifi government was quite aware of these preparations, and some of its members began to feel great

¹ The Times, 30 Jan. 1926, p. 10, dated Tangier, 28 Jan. 1926.

² Ibid., 5 Feb. 1926, p. 16.

³ Fleming, op. cit., p. 330.

⁴ Ibid., pp. 331-332.

apprehension about the coming offensive. They split into two groups, one--including Sī Maḥammad, Muḥammad Bū Drā, Aḥmad Bū Drā, and Bū Laḥya--in favour of continuing the war, the other--including bin 'Abd al-Karīm himself, Sī 'Abd al-Salām, Azarqān, and Muḥammad Bū Miḍār, the paymaster--in favour of peace.¹ At the end of February, through the offices of Ḥaddu b. Ḥammu, bin 'Abd al-Karīm's former agent on the eastern front in 1921, and later his unofficial "ambassador" to the French zone,² Gabrielli, the French contrôleur-civil in Tawrirt, again made contact with the Rifis. Acting on Resident-General Steeg's instructions, he told Ḥaddu b. Ḥammu that negotiations could only begin on the understanding that they would involve both France and Spain.³

On 18 March the French, having consulted the Spanish government, told Gabrielli of terms on which they would agree to a peace: submission to the Sultan, exile of bin 'Abd al-Karīm, the disarmament of the tribes, and the return of all prisoners.⁴ He passed these terms on to Azarqān on 24 March. Azarqān returned with these conditions to bin 'Abd al-Karīm and on 1 April Ḥaddu returned with letters from Azarqān and bin 'Abd al-Karīm agreeing to negotiations on these terms, announcing an armistice on all fronts, and stating that the Rifī delegates to the peace conference would be Azarqān, Sī Muḥammad Hitmī and Sī Aḥmad Shiddī, two minor figures in the Rifī makhzan.⁵

¹ Gabrielli, op. cit., p. 178, and Skiraj, op. cit., p. 147.

² For Ḥaddu b. Ḥammu, see above, pp. 386-388.

³ Gabrielli, op. cit., pp. 180-183.

⁴ Ibid., p. 185.

⁵ Ibid., pp. 191-194; Shiddī was "Minister of Property", Hart, Aith Waryaghar, p. 387.

On 9 April an official communiqué was issued in Paris announcing that the conference would begin on 15 April in Oujda, a town on the eastern border of Morocco with Algeria.¹ However, the conference was delayed. When the Rifi delegates, now including Ḥaddu b. Ḥammu, who had replaced al-Hitmī because of the latter's illness,² arrived at Tawrirt, they were first taken to the French post at Camp Berteaux, where they were told, on 10 April, that no conference could take place until all the prisoners were released, and the French and Spanish had been permitted a preliminary advance of several kilometres along parts of the front, in order to guarantee their "strategic security". As these terms, which the Rifis had expected to discuss at the conference, were made pre-conditions for the conference being held at all, the Rifis refused to agree to them without the permission of bin 'Abd al-Karīm. Ḥaddu b. Ḥammu returned to the Rif, and returned on 20 April with bin 'Abd al-Karīm's refusal.³

Faced with the possibility of a breakdown of the conference, the French and Spanish agreed, on 26 April, to drop their demands.⁴ Behind this decision lay considerable pressure by the French upon the Spanish authorities, who were still much less anxious for a negotiated settlement.⁵ The talks finally began on 27 April. However, these negotiations also ran into trouble over the questions of who should carry out the disarmament of the tribes, and the

¹ Harris, op. cit., pp. 278-279.

² Ibid., p. 279.

³ Ibid., pp. 285-287.

⁴ Ibid., pp. 291-292.

⁵ Fleming, op. cit., p. 340.

nature of local autonomy. This latter question raised the issue of whether the tribes' qā'ids, after the peace treaty, should be confirmed by the Sultan alone--as the Rifis wanted--or by the khalifa (in other words, the Spanish) in Tetuan--as the Spanish wanted. On 1 May the conference broke down when the French and Spanish again demanded the release of all prisoners. Azarqān and Ḥammu were taken by sea to Alhucemas and thence to Targist to inform bin 'Abd al-Karīm that the French and Spanish were unwilling to continue the Oujda conference until all the prisoners were released--not just women, children, and the severely ill, as the Rifis proposed.¹ Officially the Rifis were given a week to reply to this demand, but when Azarqān and Ḥaddu b. Ḥammu returned to Alhucemas for the journey back to Oujda on 26 May, bin 'Abd al-Karīm's refusal to these terms was already known.²

The Oujda conference had failed, despite bin 'Abd al-Karīm's desire for a negotiated settlement. Harris, who covered the conference for The Times, later wrote: ". . . it was clear from the beginning that Abdel Krim's instructions to his representatives left but little chance of a successful issue."³ In fact, both sides at the conference disagreed on nearly all the issues under discussion. As Harris pointed out, any form of autonomy for the Rif could only be granted in accordance with the powers delegated to them by the Sultan in the Protectorate treaty, and in accordance with the terms of the 1904 treaty, which distinguished between French and Spanish zones of influence.⁴ Accordingly

¹ Ibid., pp. 342-343, and Harris, op. cit., pp. 301-304, Skiraj, op. cit., pp. 148-149.

² Fleming, op. cit., p. 343.

³ Harris, op. cit., p. 296.

⁴ For the 1904 treaty, see above, pp. 76-77.

the Rifi government would have to recognise the validity of these and other treaties. This they quite refused to do.¹ To accept them would in effect have led to European control over the Rif, which was precisely what the Rifis had been fighting against for nearly five years.

The other point of issue was the release of the prisoners. Harris's explanation of their refusal is quite simple: that "most of the prisoners were dead, and Abdel Krim dared not disclose the fact!"² Accounts of Rifis mistreatment of prisoners abound.³ Hart claims that these accounts are exaggerated, and both he and Harris counterpose accounts of Spanish barbarities towards prisoners.⁴ Certainly a great many prisoners did die in captivity in the Rif--although their numbers and the cause of their deaths are not certain--but at least 283 French and Spanish prisoners were released on 26 May at the end of the war, some of them in an appalling condition.⁴ Whatever the truth of the allegation of brutality, there is another possible explanation of the refusal to release the prisoners before the end of the negotiations. To have done so would have deprived the Rifis of their strongest point of negotiation with the Allies, and so they could only refuse. In any event, the Oujda conference failed, and Spanish and French operations began again in accordance with the plans made in February.

¹ Harris, op. cit., p. 301.

² Ibid., p. 296.

³ E.g., ibid., pp. 297-299, Coon, Caravan, p. 381, and Andrés Sánchez-Pérez, "Abd-el-Krim", in Selección de conferencias y trabajos realizados por la Academia de Interventores durante el curso de 1949-50 (Tetuan, 1950), p. 62.

⁴ Hart, Aith Waryaghar, p. 399, and Harris, op. cit., p. 299.

⁵ Martínez de Campos, op. cit., p. 329.

Once they had begun, the final defeat of the Rif could not be long delayed, for the authority of the government was breaking up under the military, economic and political pressure.

The Rif during the Peace Negotiations

During March and April bin 'Abd al-Karīm was faced with considerable problems of keeping enough troops in position on the eastern front. By mid-March the numbers had fallen considerably. There were only 30 at Jabal Yuddia, one of the principal front line positions, 15 at Sūq al-Jum'a of Banū Walishak, 50 at Sidī Sha'ib, and 30 at Sidī b. Daūd (both on the Timsamān coast), 15 at Bū Ghāzī in the Banū Tūzīn, 30 at Imajarān in the Banū Sa'id, and some 600 in other positions.¹ By 22 March there was no one in Jabal Yuddia at all.² Certainly bin 'Abd al-Karīm made a strong effort to reinforce the eastern line: 100 men were sent to Issan Lassan and 300 to the Tafarsit area,³ 200 arrived at Jabal Yuddia, and another 100 at Sūq al-Sabat of Banū Walishak.⁴ Yet bin 'Abd al-Karīm seems to have felt less and less able to rely on anyone except people from the Banū Waryaghal, and it was men from this tribe who now practically monopolised all the positions as qā'ids on the front.⁵

Bin 'Abd al-Karīm seems to have made one final effort to reorganise the tribes. A great number of qā'ids,

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 30, Oficina de Información de Tafersit, 'Amarūsh, 14 Mar. 1926.

² SHM Melilla Leg. 30, Oficina de Información de Dar Mizian, Muḥ b. Ḥaddu, 22 Mar. 1926.

³ SHM Melilla Leg. 30, Oficina de Información de Drius, Salāḥ b. Muḥammad, 23 Mar. 1926.

⁴ Ibid., Ḥāmid b. Sa'id, 26 Mar. 1926.

⁵ Ibid., Salāḥ b. Muḥammad, 23 Mar. 1926.

both military and tribal, were sacked, including Ḥāmid b. Muḥammad, the qā'id of the Banū Walishak (which was half-occupied by the Spanish anyway). He was replaced by 'Amar Bū 'Azzā, the qā'id of the tiny part of Banū Sa'id which was still unoccupied, who kept his old job and was given authority over the Timsamān as well. A group of faqīhs from the Banū Waryaghal was sent into the Timsamān to make a census of all the able-bodied men, and some 1,400 of them were distributed on the eastern front.¹ However, when bin 'Abd al-Karīm called a meeting in Akhshāb Amghār in the Timsamān, to be attended by all the qā'ids of the eastern front tribes, apparently to explain his new organisation, it was widely interpreted by most of the people as something quite different. A rumour circulated that he was going to imprison all the qā'ids.²

As a result of the negotiations with the French, other rumours spread. Bin 'Abd al-Karīm encouraged the idea that he was making a unilateral truce with the French, and pointed to the renewed presence of French supplies in the markets. His aim seems to have been to encourage people by implying that they would then only have to fight the Spanish.³ Another rumour, less useful to bin 'Abd al-Karīm's cause, was that he had packed up all his property and sent it off to an unknown destination.⁴

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 30, Oficina de Información de Dar Mizian, Ḥāmid b. al-Bashīr 'Allāl, 2 Apr. 1926, and Qaddur Azuga], 3 Apr. 1926.

² Ibid., Ḥāmid b. al-Bashīr 'Allāl, 7 Apr. 1926 and SHM Melilla Leg. 30, Oficina de Información de Tafersit, 5 Apr. 1926.

³ SHM Melilla Leg. 30, Oficina de Información de Tafersit, 'Amarūsh, 4 Apr. 1926, and SHM Melilla Leg. 30, Oficina de Información de Dar Mizian, 'Amar b. al-Muqaddam, 4 Apr. 1926.

⁴ SHM Melilla Leg. 30, Oficina de Información de Drius, 'Amar Akarrūsh b. 'Aisā, 6 Apr. 1926.

More seriously, political trouble was growing in the Banū Waryaghāl itself, where Muḥ Azarqān of the Banū Bū 'Ayyāsh, 'Amar b. Ṣadiq of the Banū Ḥadhifa, and 'Amar b. Muḥammad of the Banū 'Abdallah¹ tribes were preparing to rebel.² On 20 March, bin 'Abd al-Karīm arrested two of Muḥ Azarqān's contacts with the Spanish, Muḥ 'Amar and Ḥāmid al-Darrī (both from the Timsamān).³ It seems likely that he arrested Muḥ Azarqān himself at the same time: an inference drawn from a report by a Spanish informant that on 22 March he was released "almost immediately" after his arrest on the request of the other qā'ids of the Banū Waryaghāl. Nevertheless, bin 'Abd al-Karīm did announce that he had confiscated his property.⁴ Whether such pronouncements any longer held any validity was growing increasingly uncertain. If bin 'Abd al-Karīm was unable to arrest, let alone execute, one of his principal opponents without being forced to back ¹ Muḥ Azarqān needs no reintroduction, having been discussed already in this chapter. 'Amar b. Ṣadiq was the brother of Muḥammad b. Ṣadiq, the qā'id of the clan. Both he and his brother were of doubtful loyalty (see above, pp. 174, 304), had manoeuvred against b. 'Abd al-Karīm even at the time of the greatest Rifī victories in August 1921 and had been contacted by Idrīs b. Sa'id and the Spanish over the release of the prisoners in October 1922 (above, p. 472). 'Amar b. Ṣadiq was nevertheless a man of importance in his clan and was appointed as a military qā'id by bin 'Abd al-Karīm in late 1922, at the same time as Muḥ Azarqān was appointed over the Banū Bū 'Ayyāsh (above, p. 499). 'Amar b. Ṣadiq was arrested in July 1923 as part of a purge of disloyal, inefficient and corrupt qā'ids (above, p. 628). Bin Ṣadiq's alliance with the third member of the group, 'Amar b. Muḥammad of the Banū 'Abdallah, dated back at least to December 1922 when they wrote to a Spanish agent complaining about lack of Spanish support. They had helped to organise resistance to bin 'Abd al-Karīm's attempts to impose taxes--unsuccessfully--and were in contact with 'Amar b. Ḥāmidu (above, p. 490).

² SHM Melilla Leg. 30, Oficina de Información de Tafersit, SI 'Abd al-Salām Muḥammad (Banū Bū 'Ayyāsh) and 'Abd al-Wahid b. 'Amar (Banū 'Abdallah), 11 Apr. 1926.

³ Ibid., 'Amarūsh, 20 Mar. 1926.

⁴ Ibid., Zaghūd, 22 Mar. 1926.

down by members of his own tribe, then his power was waning fast. Indeed, bin 'Abd al-Karīm seems to have been in fear of his life. He was keeping his whereabouts secret, and avoided sleeping in the same house on successive nights.¹

Nevertheless, he still had a considerable amount of authority as a military leader and, despite the truce that accompanied the Oujda conference, he ordered the front lines to be reinforced, although he issued orders for the cease-fire to all commanders.² Defence preparations, which had begun with the construction of a telephone line to Iharrushān in the first week of April,³ continued with a stockpiling of material at Anwāl, and a general reinforcement of the front lines. 350 men from the Banū Waryaghāl arrived at Sūq al-Sabat of Banū Walishak, and 50 at Bū Ghāzī, with a machine gun, on 17 April.⁴ 200 were sent to Sūq al-Thalathā' of Azilāf, and 300 to Miḍār.⁵ By 20 April the eastern front was reasonably well garrisoned: 600 men near Afrāw, 200 at Sūq al-Sabat (Banū Walishak), 100 at Sīdī Misa'ūd in the Banū Sa'id, 200 in Jabel Yuddia, and another 1,200 in various other positions.⁶ Bin 'Abd al-Karīm started drilling and training ḥarkas on the front.⁷

All this time, bin 'Abd al-Karīm was making

¹ Ibid., Zaghdūd, 19 Mar. 1926.

² Ibid., Zaghdūd, 18 Mar. 1926, and 'Amarūsh, 18 Mar. 1926.

³ SHM Melilla Leg. 30, Oficina de Información de Dar Mizian, Ḥāmid b. al-Bashīr 'Allāl, 12 Apr. 1926.

⁴ SHM Melilla Leg. 30, Oficina de Información de Tafersit, 'Amarūsh, 17 Apr. 1926.

⁵ SHM Melilla Leg. 30, Oficina de Drius, 15 Apr. 1926.

⁶ Ibid., Muḥand al-Darmūsī, 19 Apr. 1926, and 'Abdallah Tūzānī, 20 Apr. 1926.

⁷ SHM Melilla Leg. 30, Oficina de Información de Dar Mizian, Ḥāmid al-Bashīr, 22 Apr. 1926 and al-'Arbī b. Muḥ b. 'Alī, 23 Apr. 1926.

considerable propaganda with the peace negotiations in Oujda. His presentation of what was happening differed considerably from reality. He told people that the peace negotiations were aimed at a truce with France but not Spain.¹ He also misrepresented the terms offered at Oujda, saying that there were three points: the disarmament of the tribes, the establishment of five "European" military posts in each tribe, and that he would be a "delegate" of the Sultan. There was no mention of the release of the prisoners. In his letter to the tribes setting out these "terms" he also detailed his reply. To the first--the disarmament--he said he refused. To the second--the establishment of military positions--he said that these should be run by local people. To the third--his own position--in a startlingly irrelevant evasion of the point, he told them not to worry, that he would protect them with the support of the United States and United Kingdom.² This is a curious explanation of the position. The omission of all reference to the prisoners seems to be explicable only in terms of their use as a bargaining point--bin 'Abd al-Karīm's control of the prisoners was of vital importance in his negotiations with the French and Spanish, but also marks a return to the position in the aftermath of the victories of August 1921, when the holding of prisoners gave bin 'Abd al-Karīm a certain authority among the Rifis. Clearly to admit now that he was negotiating for their release would have been a mistake. The disarmament of the tribes was one of the principal stumbling-blocks at Oujda, but there the argument was over who should do it rather than whether it should be done at all. The same applies to the position of bin 'Abd. al-Karīm and the relations with the Sultan. At Oujda the Rifi delegates were offering to submit to the Sultan alone, but not to the khalifa in Tetuan, in a form of local autonomy. In this letter bin 'Abd. al-Karīm seems to be calling still for total independence. The Rifi leader was clearly telling his supporters one thing and the Spanish something completely different.

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 30, Oficina de Información de Tafersit, Zaghdūd, 25 Apr. 1926.

² Ibid., Zaghdūd, 26 Apr. 1926.

Despite bin 'Abd. al-Karīm's attempt to play a double game, and to imply that he was working only for a peace with France, the general feeling in the Rif was now for complete peace. Economic conditions were so bad and the political unity of the Rifi state was breaking up so fast, that this was probably the only practical course anyway. Certainly when, on 30 April, bin 'Abd. al-Karīm called a meeting of the faqīhs of the Central Rif and asked them to choose between peace with France, Spain, or with both countries, they said they wanted peace with both.¹ However, by this time bin 'Abd. al-Karīm must have known that the conference at Oujda was failing, and he made preparations for the final resistance.

He had re-arrested Muḥ. Azaraqān on the Banū Bū 'Ayyāsh on 26 April² and this time he stayed in prison--while rumours circulated that he had been shot.³ A number of other Waryaghli qā'ids were arrested as well, along with 25 men from the Banū Tūzīn, and were imprisoned in a store room 20

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 30, Oficina de Información de Drius, Hammu 'Allāl, Mizzyān, 30 Apr. 1926.

² Ibid., Hammu b. Sa'Id, 30 Apr. 1926, and SHM Melilla Leg. 30, Oficina de Información de Dar Mizian, Hāmid b. al-Bashīr 'Allāl, 22 Apr. 1926.

³ SHM Melilla Leg. 30, Oficina de Información de Tafersit, Hammu Darri, 4 May 1926.

metres square.¹ A qā'id of 25 from Tafarsit was shot for having relations with the Spanish.²

Attempts were made to reinforce the front against the Spanish and French, but Fleming's figure of some 16,500 and Sánchez Pérez's of 20,000, as an estimate of the number of Rifis prepared for the final battle,³ must be viewed with some reserve. Certainly there were large groups--1,000 at Tamasind who arrived from the Ghumāra, 360 in the Banū Walishak, 150 near Miḍār, 50 at Jabal al-Mā' in the Banū Tūzīn, and so on.⁴ However, there seem to have been fairly few people to act as further reinforcements. The guard at Sīdī Muḥand Jilālī in the Timsamān was reinforced with 9 men, bringing the total up to 29;⁵ and those men that were there were not well armed. Of the 400 on guard in the Banū Walishak, one informant estimated that at least 210 had old Mauser and Remington rifles, which had been badly maintained and were consequently in bad condition. Indeed, the total number of rifles collected up after the surrender of the Central Rif tribes was only 14,500.⁷ It seems likely that Woolman's estimate of 12,000 men is somewhere nearer to

¹ SHM Melilla Leg. 30, Oficina de Información de Drius, Ḥammu 'Allāl Mizzyān, 30 Apr. 1926.

² SHM Melilla Leg. 30, Oficina de Información de Tafarsit Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Salām, 28 Apr. 1926.

³ Fleming, op. cit., p. 345, and Sánchez-Pérez, Acción, pp. 21-22.

⁴ SHM Melilla Leg. 30, Oficina de Información de Dar Mizian, Ḥāmid b. al-Bashīr 'Allāl, 1 May 1926, and 4 May 1926, SHM Melilla Leg. 30, Oficina de Información de Tafarsit, Ḥaddu b. Sha'ib b. 'Amar, 3 May 1926, 'Abd al-Salām b. Qaddur, 8 May 1926, SHM Melilla Leg. 30, Oficina de Información de Drius, Ḥammu b. Sa'id, 30 Apr. 1926.

⁵ SHM Melilla Leg. 30, Oficina de Información de Dar Mizian, Ḥāmid b. al-Bashīr 'Allāl, 4 May 1926.

⁶ Ibid., Ḥāmid b. Ḥaddu b. Qaddur, 9 May 1926.

⁷ Martínez de Campos, op. cit., p. 332.

the truth.¹

In addition, the control of the Rifis on the western zone was failing rapidly. For some time people from the Central Rif had been returning home from the Jibāla, Sinhāja, and to a lesser extent the Ghumāra. On 7 April, the Spanish were told that most Rifis had left the Tetuan area.² By mid-April most of the Rifis had left the Sinhāja as well.³ As a result, bin 'Abd al-Karīm told the local people in the Sinhāja to prepare their own defence.⁴ The situation had returned to each tribe looking after itself.

Clearly, when once the French and Spanish attack came, the resistance would crumble quickly. When the announcement of the peace negotiations was made on 6 May, it took only two days for the attack to begin.

The Final Invasion of the Rif

In fact, by the time the attack came, on 8 May, bin 'Abd al-Karīm seems to have realised that he, and the Rif, were inevitably going to be defeated. Ranged against him, on the Spanish fronts, were 28,000 in the Ajdir sector, 12,000 men in the Banū Tūzīn and al-Maṭālsa, 3,000 in the Banū Sa'id, and, on the French fronts, 40,000 in the Gaznaya and Marnisa, and another 40,000 in the Sinhāja and Banū Zarwāl -- a total of 123,000 men, together with 150 French and Spanish aeroplanes.⁵

¹ Woolman, op. cit., p. 204.

² SHM Melilla, Leg. 30, Oficina de Información de Drius, Muḥammad b. Ḥammūsh, 7 Apr. 1927.

³ SHAT Maroc Riff 8, Fez, Groupement de Fès, Novembre 1925 - Juillet 1926, C.M.T. 17 Apr. 1926.

⁴ Ibid.

⁵ Sánchez-Pérez, Acción, pp. 14-19.

The plan agreed in Madrid in February was for a three-pronged attack by the Spanish: from Ajdir up the Wādī Ghīs and Wādī Nakūr valleys towards the centre of Jabal Hamām; from 'Azīb Miḍār through the Banū Tūzīn towards Sūq al-Thalāthā' of Azilāf; and an attack from the Banū Sa'id towards the Timsamān. The French forces would also undertake a three-pronged attack: from Bāb Sultān in the Gaznaya towards Timarzga; from al-Nazūr of the Gaznaya into the Banū 'Amārt; and through the Marnīsa towards Targīst (see Map XIII: 3). The intention was to break the opposition of the Central Rif, and only after that had been achieved to clear all the "rebels" from the Jibāla and Sinhāja regions.¹ The plan was followed almost to the letter.

The attack began on the morning of 8 May. It is not proposed here to describe the advance in detail, but a summary may be useful. The initial attack on the Ajdir was heavily resisted from the Rifī trenches, helped by their cannons, but Asghār was reached on the first day, at a cost of 629 Spanish casualties and 80 Rifis.²

On the eastern front, the Spanish were able to advance from Miḍār with relative ease, the Rifis falling back, under the command of Idrīs b. Mimūn Khujja, in the face of Spanish tanks.³ When they reached Sūq al-Thalāthā' of Azilāf on 9 May, there was considerable resistance, however, and the Spanish lost 86 men.⁴ Meanwhile the French moved up from the south and met the Spanish near Thalāthā' Azilāf on 8 May.⁵

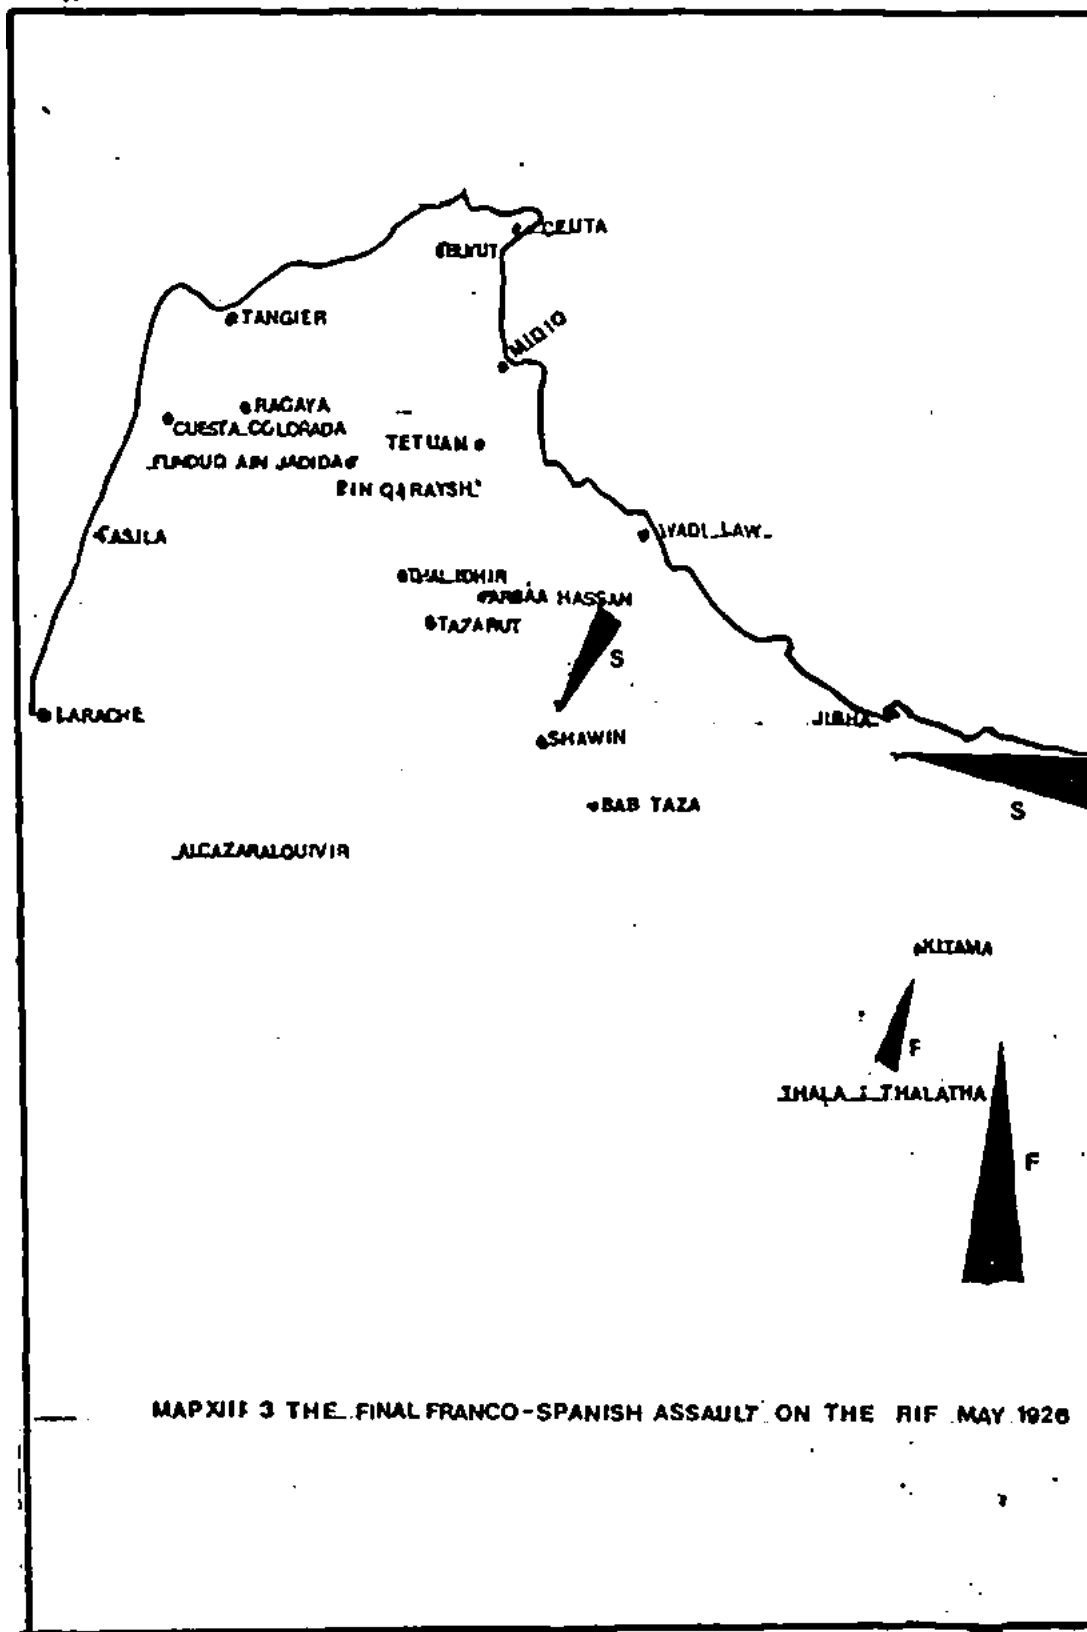

¹ Ibid., pp. 12-13.

² Ibid., pp. 46-47.

³ Ibid., pp. 36-38.

⁴ Ibid., pp. 51-52.

⁵ Ibid., pp. 48-49.

F. Indicates French attack

S.  Spanish *****

By 15 May the Spanish had moved down to Tamasind and on 20 May met with the French forces moving up from the south.¹ Meanwhile Spanish troops advanced in the northern part of the eastern front. 'Amar Bū 'Azza, the qā'id of the small part of the Banū Sa'id that had remained unoccupied since 1922, surrendered on 15 May, and this was followed by the submission of the Banū Marghanin clan of the Timsamān, and the western part of the Banū Walishak. Anwāl was reoccupied on 18 May, and on 20 May Spanish troops pushed to link up with the Ajdīr front.²

On the southern front French troops moved through the Banū Zarwāl, the Jaya, Matīwa al-Jabal and Banū Waryajal who submitted on 17 May. On 19 May French troops moved into the Banū 'Amārt with little opposition, and to the west 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu occupied Jabal 'Uqba.³ By 23 May the French had cut the Banū Waryaghāl in half.

Bin 'Abd al-Karīm's reaction to these advances was to move further away from the Spanish forces; his personal will to resist seems to have collapsed. On the opening day of the attack he moved to the zawiya of Sī 'Abdallah b. Yūsif near Kammūn in the Banū Waryaghāl.⁴ The prisoners were transferred to the Banū Bū Frāḥ.⁵ His personal safety secured for the moment, he announced that it was the responsibility of each tribe to defend its own territory.⁶ As an

¹ Fleming, op. cit., p. 347.

² Sánchez-Pérez, Acción, pp. 93-94.

³ Ibid., pp. 95-96.

⁴ SHM Melilla Leg. 30, Oficina de Información de Tafersit, Mūlāy 'Abd al-Salām b. Raḥayl, 8 May 1926, and Skīraj, op. cit., p. 151.

⁵ SHM Melilla Leg. 30, Oficina de Información de Tafersit, 'Abd al-Salām b. Sha'ib, 9 May 1926.

⁶ Ibid., Ḥammu Darrī, 8 May 1926.

indication of his own frame of mind at this stage, Idris b. Mimūn Khujja later told the Spanish that he and a number of other commanders visited bin 'Abd al-Karīm in SI 'Abdallah b. Yūsif, and when, on the following morning, he saw them eating their breakfast and drinking tea he asked:

"How can you be so calm, eating and drinking, with all that is happening to us?' We replied that we were men and had to eat and drink, but that we would also die if necessary. Then he said to us 'For God's sake, I have no desire to eat. I want to know what to do!'"¹

In fact, the remaining fighting was being carried out, almost independently of bin 'Abd al-Karīm, by such as Idris b. Mimūn Khujja and 'Abd al-Salām b. al-Ḥājj Muḥand, until the latter was seriously wounded. On the eastern front, 'Amar Bū 'Azzā of the Banū Sa'id carried on the resistance, arresting those who were in contact with the Spanish,² until he himself surrendered on 15 May, when all the Banū Waryaghāl on the eastern front went home to protect their own homes.³ Skīraj says that this was on the authority of bin 'Abd al-Karīm himself,⁴ but by this time he had little authority left. The people simply left.

Meanwhile, in the Jibāla, Akhrīrū and Aḥmad Bū Drā made an attempt at a diversionary operation near Tetuan. On 10 May about 1,000 Jibālīs and Ghumārīs attacked Spanish positions near the Wādī Martil. At first they were quite successful and on 17 May the High Commissioner, Sanjurjo, returned to Tetuan from Alhucemas to oversee the relief

¹ Sánchez-Pérez, Acción, p. 108.

² SHM Melilla Leg. 30, Oficina de Información de Tafersit, 'Abd al-Salām, b. Sha'ib, 12 May 1926.

³ SHM Melilla Leg. 30, Oficina de Información de Dar Mizian, Ḥāmid b. al-Bashīr 'Allāl, 15 May 1926.

⁴ Skīraj, op. cit., pp. 141-152.

operations. On 19 May the positions were relieved.¹ This was the last offensive action against the Spanish. From now on it was a question of the Spanish and French clearing up the last Rifi resistance.

The Surrender of bin 'Abd al-Karīm

Faced with a situation in which the Spanish and French were pushing forward into the Rif from the east and south, a number of choices seem to have occurred to him. Firstly he thought briefly that he could continue to lead the resistance in the Rif, with support from the Jibāla. However, when he asked for troops from the Ghazāwa, Rahūna, Banū Sikkar, Banū Issaf, Sumāta and Jabal Ḥabīb tribes, his request was refused.² Another alternative that suggested itself was that he should himself cross into the Jibāla to lead the resistance personally.³ This turned out to be physically impossible, for the French were already moving up through Sūq al-Ithnayn of the Banū 'Amārt towards Targist, on 21 May, cutting the road to the Jibāla.⁴ The road along the coast was impractical anyway for his large party. The other alternative was to surrender.

The usual explanation of bin 'Abd al-Karīm's decision to surrender to the French is that he was frightened that the Spanish would execute him.⁵ In any event bin 'Abd

¹ Fleming, op. cit., pp. 348-349.

² SHAT Maroc Riff 8, Groupement de Fès, Novembre 1925-Juillet 1926, C.M.T., Fez, 21 May 1926.

³ Skīraj, op. cit., p. 152.

⁴ Sánchez-Pérez, Acción, p. 115, and Skīraj, op. cit., p. 152.

⁵ Woolman, op. cit., p. 206, and Fleming, op. cit., p. 349 (quoting Sanjurjo--letter to Primo de Rivera, 2 June 1926), and Hart, Aith Waryaghar, p. 401.

al-Karīm did surrender to the French. The intermediary was Sīdī Ḥamīdu in Snāda. On 21 May, still thinking of fleeing to the west, he had asked Sīdī Ḥamīdu for animals to take his property and equipment from Targīst into the Ghumāra.¹ At the same time he sent a letter to Sanjurjo and Resident-General Steeg in Rabat, suggesting a cease-fire. The letter was carried out by Pierre Parent, head of a French medical team which was visiting the French prisoners. Parent crossed the Spanish lines on 23 May, handed his letter to Sanjurjo and was flown to Rabat to hand the other to Steeg.² There was, however, no time for such a cease-fire to be arranged. On 23 May, French irregular troops under bin 'Abd al-Karīm's old enemy, 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu, occupied Targīst.³ The following morning the Banū Yiṭṭuft, Banū Gamīl and Banū Bū Frāḥ tribes offered to submit to the French. Bin 'Abd al-Karīm his escape route to the west finally cut off, turned to the only sanctuary left for him--the zawiya of Sīdī Ḥamīdu in Snāda. That same afternoon, after his arrival in Snāda, al-Raisūlī's son and Sīdī Ḥamīdu's nephew arrived at Targīst and told the French that bin 'Abd al-Karīm could be easily captured by only a few men. The French officer in command at Targīst, Colonel Corap "did not believe he should give any encouragement to this plan, which appeared to him to serve the personal ambitions of the two people concerned."⁴ On the morning of 25 April, Sīdī Ḥamīdu himself arrived in Targīst to submit to the

¹ SHAT Maroc Riff 8, Groupement de Fès, Novembre-1925-Juillet 1926, C.M.T., Fez, 21 May 1926.

² Fleming, op. cit., p. 350.

³ Sánchez-Pérez, Acción, p. 115.

⁴ SHAT Maroc Riff 8 (no file), Commandement Supérieur des Troupes du Maroc--Rapport du General Boichut sur les circonstances de la reddition d'Abd el Krim, Rabat, 9 June 1926, Secret.

French. Corap sent a letter back to bin 'Abd al-Karīm with Sidī Ḥamīdu, along with three French officers who, after a long discussion, persuaded bin 'Abd al-Karīm to surrender. At 11 p.m. on 25 May, bin 'Abd al-Karīm ordered the prisoners to be released and himself surrendered.¹ The following morning the surviving prisoners were escorted to the French lines.² On 27 March bin 'Abd al-Karīm himself arrived in Targīst where he was courteously received by Corap,³ and then escorted out of the Rif (see Photograph XIII: 1). With his surrender the Rifī state was formally at an end, although fighting continued for a few more months.⁴

The Final Operations

With bin 'Abd al-Karīm's surrender to the French, the leadership of the Rifī resistance--for that was what it had become--was removed. Fighting continued, but it was very fragmented.

In the Rif, the Spanish forces moved to occupy the Buqquya and the rest of the Banū Waryaghāl. On 28 May one

¹ Ibid.

² Harris, op. cit., p. 317.

³ Ibid., p. 318. The chronology of the surrender is confused by the different authors. Fleming (op. cit., p. 349) has bin 'Abd al-Karīm's flight to Snāda as early as 16 May, Wooman (op. cit., p. 23) says that on 23 May bin 'Abd al-Karīm had "already" fled to Snāda. Neither of these writers used the SHAT archives, and the official French account is certainly the most reliable. This account also makes the significant point that right up till 24 May bin 'Abd al-Karīm was still indecisively wondering whether he could flee to the Ghumāra and continue the struggle.

⁴ Bin 'Abd al-Karīm, his brother and other members of his family were taken by the French to the island of Réunion where they remained until 1947. (Hart, Aith Waryaghār, p. 401). Other members of the Cabinet remained in Morocco. Indeed, two of them, Muḥammad Bū Drā and Muḥammad Azarqān formed a political party, the Ḥizb al-Aḥrār, of a distinctly conservative hue in the 1930s. Great Britain, Morocco, Vol. II, p. 191.

Photograph XIII: 1

Muhammad bin 'Abd al-Karim (mounted left) riding into captivity with the French

Source: Illustrated London News, 16 June 1926,

p. 1013

group of Spanish forces moved into the Buqquya while another occupied Sī 'Abdallah b. Yūsif without difficulty. There, in a house next door to the mosque, they found what had been bin 'Abd al-Karīm's residence during the final stages of the war. Apart from a huge quantity of personal effects, the Spanish discovered a vast number of papers and books which they took into their custody, and a flag of the Rifi state.¹

On 29 May Spanish troops moved towards Sūq al-Aḥad of Tiṣār in the centre of the Banū Waryaghal. Here they were attacked with considerable vigour. Fighting lasted all day, and the Spanish suffered over 600 casualties.² It was, as David Hart says, "the final stand of the Aith Waryaghar."³

With the defeat of the Banū Waryaghal and the occupation of the Rif, fighting continued in the Jibāla, Sinhāja and Ghumāra. As soon as bin 'Abd al-Karīm surrendered, the French Air Force dropped leaflets on the Banū Zarwāl informing them of the fact, and calling on them to submit.⁴ However, the rest of the Jibāla either did not know of the surrender, or refused to believe it. A French memorandum of 31 May reported:

"The most varied rumours circulate in the mountains about the fate of Abd el Krim and as a general rule

¹ Sánchez-Pérez, Acción, pp. 121-125. The flag was later handed over to the Museo de Infantería (now the Museo del Ejército) in Madrid. The destination of the papers is uncertain. It seems quite likely that they were taken to Tetuan, and they may now be in the archives of the Moroccan Protectorate, housed at present in the Archivos de la Presidencia del Gobierno in Alcalá de Menares near Madrid. Unfortunately these archives were not available for consultation when the research for this thesis was carried out. Very recently they have been opened, and it would be most interesting to examine them.

² Ibid., pp. 128-133.

³ Hart, Aith Waryaghar, p. 401.

⁴ The Times, 29 May 1926, p. 12, dated Paris, 28 May 1926.

people refuse to believe that he has surrendered. His former Lieutenants in the Djeballa continue to speak in his name and are still talking of the rapid arrival of reinforcements."¹

For a short while those "lieutenants" held on to their positions of authority. On 2 June al-Baqqālī Wuld al-Qūrfa, one of bin 'Abd al-Karīm's most trusted commanders in the west, remained in charge of Shāwin, and tried to organise the resistance. He ordered the Ghazāwa and Raḥūna not to attack the French but to send reinforcements to the Banū Idhīr against the Spanish.² However, his authority did not last long. On 2 June a previously insignificant qā'id named Wuld al-Far decided to take control in the Jibāla. He sent 50 men to al-Raisūlī's old home in Tazarūt to arrest the Rīfī qā'id there and a few members of the former Rīfī regular army, and announced he would take over in Shāwin and remove Wuld al-Qūrfa.³ He was helped in this by a general wish for revenge on the representatives of the Rīfī domination which was sweeping the Jibāla. The Banū Issaf and Akhmās combined to send a force to the Banū Sikkar to "execute" the Qā'id al-Ḥattāsh, who had been instrumental in crushing the first revolt in the Ghumāra in July 1923,⁴ although he succeeded in escaping to the Rīf.⁵

The revenge against the Rīfis was widespread. A former Rīfī official in the Akhmās was executed, as were several in the Ghumāra.⁶ On 9 June Wuld al-Far occupied

¹ SHAT Maroc Riff 8, Groupement de Fès, Novembre 1925-Juillet 1926, C.M.T., Fez, 21 May 1926.

² Ibid., C.M.T., Fez, 2 June 1926.

³ Ibid., C.M.T. fex, 8 June 1926. The few accounts of Wuld al-Far that exist are unclear even about his origins.

⁴ Ibid., for al-Ḥattāsh, see above, pp. 622, 671.

⁵ Ibid., C.M.T. Fez, 9 June 1926. Presumably he then surrendered for there is no further mention of him.

⁶ Ibid.

Shāwin, and executed Wuld al-Qūrfa.¹ On 13 June, prominent pro-Rifī qā'ids in the Ghazāwa were attacked and their houses burned.²

Meanwhile a Spanish force under Lt. Colonel Capaz set out, on 12 June, from the Buqquya along the coast through the Masāsa and Matīwa. On 25 June he reached Amṭār. Then he struck inland into the Banū Ḥassan before reaching Wādī Lāw on 10 July.³

This is not to say that by now all the resistance to the Spanish was completely overcome. There were still a number of important pro-Rifī leaders in the Ghumāra at large, and they tried, in a rather fragmented way, to organise resistance. The most prominent of these was Akhrirū, who joined up with al-Ṭālib al-Shawnī and Mūlāy Aḥmad al-Baqar to try to take control in the Jibāla.⁴ Al-Baqar took over Shāwin and proclaimed himself Sultan, signing himself Ibn al-'Abbās b. 'Abdallah al-'Alamī.⁵ As his full name was Mūlāy Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. al-'Arbī "al-Baqar" this choice is not easily explicable, except that by emphasising his connection with Jabal 'Alām and therefore descent from Mūlāy 'Abd al-Salām b. Mashīsh, the "pole" of Islam in Morocco, he was reverting to the traditional practices of leadership by

¹ Ibid., and C.M.T. Fez, 10 June 1926.

² Ibid., C.M.T. Fez, 13 June 1926.

³ Martínez de Campos, op. cit., p. 335.

⁴ SHAT Maroc Riff 8, Groupement de Fès, Novembre 1925-Juillet 1926, C.M.T. Fez, 28 June 1926. Mūlāy Aḥmad al-Baqar was a long-standing enemy of Spain, and of al-Raisūlī (see above, p. 363), who had helped al-Akhamlīsh in the initial Rifī sortie into the Jibāla in Oct. 1921 (above, p. 432), and had taken part in the final assault on al-Raisūlī's base at Tazarūt in Feb. 1925 (above, p. 706). Al-Shawnī has already been discussed in this chapter, p. 802.

⁵ Intervención de Larache, Beni Aros, pp. 38-39.

important religious families, an idea which bin 'Abd al-Karīm had rejected.

His was not a successful reign, however, nor a very long one for by and large the majority of people wanted to stop fighting. When he ordered the Banū Issaf to assemble and form a ḥarka he was largely ignored,¹ although he did undertake an invasion of the Banū Zarwāl at the end of June,² which was unsuccessful.

Meanwhile, in the Sinhāja, Muḥammad al-Akhamlīsh tried to reimpose his authority, and sent out letters calling for resistance.³ The Sinhāja held out for some time, while Spanish forces under Capaz moved up from the Wādī Lāw to take Shāwin on 10 August, in a very rapid operation later named the "Capaz Raid".⁴

Akhrīrū was killed in a skirmish in the Banū Idhīr in the Jabāla on 3 November, but parts of the Sinhāja held out until the beginning of 1927. The final operations in the Jibāla took place in June 1927, with the occupation of Jabel 'Alām on 14 June 1927. Two days before this operation started, al-Baqar was killed by a bomb,⁶ and finally, with the occupation of the remaining parts of the Akhmās which had not submitted,⁷ the last resistance ceased

¹ SHAT Maroc Riff 8, Groupement de Fès, Novembre 1925-Juillet 1926, C.M.T. Fez, 29 June 1926.

² The Times, 1 July 1925, p. 16, dated Paris, 30 June 1926.

³ SHAT Maroc Riff 8, Groupement de Fès, Novembre 1925-Juillet 1926, C.M.T. Fez, 3 July 1926.

⁴ Martínez de Campos, op. cit., p. 335.

⁵ Hart, Aith Waryaghar, p. 403. Martínez de Campos, op. cit., pp. 342-348, describes the campaign of the winter of 1926-1927 in the Sinhāja in detail.

⁶ Intervención de Larache, Beni Aros, p. 39.

⁷ Martínez de Campos, op. cit., pp. 352-356.

on 9 July 1927.¹

Conclusion

The months between September 1925 and July 1926 saw the collapse of the Rifi state. However, it was not an immediate collapse, for when the Spanish landed on the coast near Alhucemas the Rifis were well organised, and they resisted the invading forces with considerable determination. For all the huge numbers of Spanish troops involved, they were only able to advance a few miles around Alhucemas Bay. The French advance was also resisted, and on the southern front the Rifis were able to stop the invaders on the edges of the Rif. In the west they were not forced to retire at all.

Nevertheless, the landings in the heart of the Rif did shake bin 'Abd al-Karim's authority. His problem over the next few months was to maintain control of the Rif. From the social point of view, internal order and discipline were maintained, at least until the peace conference at Ujda was over. Feuding, which broke out for a brief period, was quickly stopped; murderers continued to be severely punished. In April, Alexander Langlet was able to claim that it was possible to sleep in the open in the Rif. This may have been an exaggeration, but it implies a high level of order.

From a political point of view, bin 'Abd al-Karim remained in a strong position. Just before the Spanish landings he had further centralised power in his own hands. This bore fruit in the months after the Spanish landings. Those who were suspected of dealing with the enemy were severely dealt with. Even as late as March 1926, a woman from the Banū Tūzīn who was suspected of spying for the Spanish in Tafarsit was sent to prison in the Central Rif.¹

¹ Ibid., p. 356.

However, a great deal of bin 'Abd al-Karīm's authority had rested on his reputation for success. Once the Spanish had landed in Alhucemas, the propaganda by success worked in reverse. It became increasingly difficult to recruit people into harkas to fight a losing battle when the harvests had failed and the economic situation was so difficult. Furthermore, these economic difficulties made it increasingly more difficult to pay those who were fighting.

In these circumstances, bin 'Abd al-Karīm was forced to rely more and more on severely dictatorial practices. However, these tactics were only with difficulty applied to his more important opponents. To have been too severe with important local qā'ids might very well have caused yet more trouble. This is possibly why Muḥ Azarqān was only arrested--and that for short periods at a time--and not executed. Bin 'Abd al-Karīm was forced to try to keep a precarious political balance between antagonising potential opponents and allowing latitude to his actual opponents. That he managed to do so for so long in difficult economic and political circumstances says a great deal for his ability.

To help him maintain this political balance, he conducted a vigorous propaganda campaign. It took a number of directions. Firstly he emphasised the possible oppression that Spanish rule would bring. In this he was helped by the unsavoury activities of troops in Spanish employ. Secondly he tried to encourage people outside the Rif to help him by appealing to their religious and nationalist sentiments, calling in effect for a jihād. Thirdly he made frequent promises of outside help for the Rif--from Germany and Turkey, recalling those countries' help against the French during the First World War, and making use of the prestige of Turkey after the victories of Atatürk. Finally, he made considerable play of the pressures on Spain and France, and particularly France, from their own people, to end the war. This last approach gave rise to hopes of a negotiated peace with France, which might have left him free to attack Spain, hopes of which bin 'Abd al-Karīm made considerable use in his propaganda.

¹ MAEF, Maroc 519,--Qā'id Muḥammad b. (illegible) to bin 'Abd al-Karīm, 4 Ramaḍān 1344/18 Mar. 1926, committing Mizzyāna b. Ḥaddu Ḥamḥamī al-Tūzānī to prison for spying.

This raises the question of the aims of the peace negotiations and the terms on which 'Abd al-Karīm and his principal supporters were willing to agree to an end to the war. During these nine months bin 'Abd al-Karīm told a number of different people different things about the terms which were acceptable. He told Vincent Sheean that the only terms were the "total independence of the Rif". Gardiner was told that he would accept a position as a delegate of the Sultan, with autonomy but not independence, but with his capital at Tetuan. By implication, at the conference of Oujda, bin 'Abd al-Karīm conceded the question of Tetuan, agreed over the disarmament of the tribes, but still refused to act as anything less than a direct delegate of the Sultan. Yet he told his own people at the same time that he would refuse the disarmament and, again by implication, that he would not be a delegate of the Sultan. All this brings into question the validity of the peace negotiations at all. In fact, it seems quite likely that bin 'Abd al-Karīm was trying to get the best possible arrangement that he could, provided that his formal autonomy from the Spanish was maintained. This was a minimum demand, which he could not afford to drop, for it would have invalidated all the developments of the previous five years. This desire to get the best possible arrangements also explains why he would not release the Spanish and French prisoners of war, for they were both a vital bargaining counter with the Allies, and also a symbol of his own authority in the Rif.

The period of negotiation also gave the Rifis time to prepare their defences against the final assault, and during April and early May a great effort was made to reinforce the front and to train the troops. It is certainly true, as al-Bū 'Ayyāshī says, that the Rifis did not use the period between October 1925 and May 1926, when there was little fighting, to prepare themselves for the coming battle as much as did the Spanish,¹ or the French, for that matter. However, the Rifis' resources were far too few and their defences were too stretched to prepare themselves adequately anyway.

When the attack came the Rif collapsed. It should be noted here that it was the core of the state, the Central Rif which was attacked, and the core which collapsed. As pressure grew on the Rif, those Rifis who were elsewhere, in the Jibāla or on the French front in the Sinhāja went home to help in the fight. At the same time, bin 'Abd al-Karīm's own morale grew steadily worse. A man, who on Sheean's account had been extremely optimistic in September

¹ Al-Bū 'Ayyāshī, op. cit., Vol. II, p. 440.

1925, immediately after the landings, changed to one who, on his own admission, found it difficult to eat for worry.

On his surrender, the Jibāla and Sinhāja fought on for a while. Such was the authority of bin 'Abd al-Karīm that for a short while his supporters in the Jibāla were able to pretend that he had not surrendered. Harris says:

"It is a curious fact that though the Jibāla tribes had been slow to adhere to Abdel Krim's campaign, and had awaited the downfall of Raisuli before doing so, they were the last to abandon their fallen chief."¹

This is not true. Once the Jibālā tribes realised that the state into which they had been forcibly incorporated by invasion had been destroyed, they rose against its representatives. All pretence at unity collapsed. Those who wished to carry on fighting resorted to the traditional, highly localised methods of resistance, either through guerrilla warfare, or attempts to set themselves up as "Sultans", basing their authority on religious prestige.

Clearly this disunited resistance could not last. As bin 'Abd al-Karīm had proved, the only effective opponent of two states was another state. Once the Rifi state was defeated the remaining pockets of resistance were quickly cleared away.

¹ Harris, op. cit., p. 326.

Chapter XIV

CONCLUSION

The Rif war was a remarkable period in Moroccan history. For some five years, the Spanish and then the French were held back by an ill-fed, relatively untrained and hastily assembled army of men from what was generally agreed to be one of the most backward areas of a backward country. It is clear, from the evidence examined in this thesis, that the explanations that have so far been given for the success--and for the ultimate failure--of the Rifi state are woefully inadequate. It will be remembered from the introductory chapter that these explanations varied between the theories of men like Robert Montagne, who saw the war as an attempt to build a new state in the Rif on the pattern of the great Berber empires of the Middle Ages, the views of a modern nationalist writer like Laroui who described the Rif war as the last outburst of rural resistance, bearing no relation to modern urban Moroccan nationalism, and the ideas of 'Allāl al-Fasī, another modern political theorist and nationalist, who describes a modern democratic movement in the Rif. All these views also concentrate on the personality of the Rifi leader, Muḥammad bin 'Abd al-Karīm. Thus, by trying to fit the war into a neat category, and by seeing it as entirely the work of a single man, these commentators both diminish the achievement of the Rīfī movement, and oversimplify its significance so that its real place in Moroccan history is lost. They explain neither why the Rīfī movement grew up, nor the position within it of Muḥammad bin 'Abd al-Karīm, nor the way in which circumstances and ideology determined its growth, nor the reasons for its final failure.

To be fair, the one person who could have explained some of these aspects of the Rīf war, bin 'Abd al-Karīm himself, did not do so. Bin 'Abd al-Karīm's only personal account of the war takes the form of a really very short article in the Egyptian journal al-Manār in 1927.¹ Al-Manār was then edited by Muḥammad 'Abduh, one of the most important religious reformists of the time, and the article referred to here bears considerable relevance to the ideology of the Salafiya movement. The article must be seen in this light, not as a sociological or even a historical analysis, but as an ideological attempt to explain to an Arab public in Egypt and the Levant the "patriotic" aspects of a failed struggle.

An ideological explanation, from the principal leader of the Rīfīs at war, is, of course a document of great importance, raising as it does some of the fundamental issues of the struggle. As such it is reproduced here:

¹ Anonymous article "Jahl zu'amā' al-Muslimīn wa-mafāsīd ahl al-ṭuruq wal-shurafā' wa Kawnuhum sababan li-faṣḥl za'im al-Rīf al-Maghrabi"-in al-Manār, pt. 8, Voo. 27, 1344-5/1926-27, pp. 630-634. The text of the article appeared in the Egyptian weekly al-Shūra, according to al-Manār, Shinar (op. cit., p. 173, note 1958) says that it was also reprinted in al-Minhāj, Muharram/Ṣafar, pp. 96 ff. Shinar's article reproduces about two thirds of the article in translation, but omits the important opening paragraphs which were not completely relevant to his examination of the religious thought of bin 'Abd al-Karīm. For reasons of convenience, the whole article is reproduced below.

"An interview with Muḥammad 'Abd al-Karīm [sic].

I wanted to make the Rif an independent country like France and Spain, and to set up there a free state with full sovereignty and not an Amirate, subject to the regulations and ordinances of the Protectorate. From the first I tried to make my people understand that they could not survive unless they were as closely joined together as are the bricks of a building, and unless they worked with sincerity and loyalty to form a national unity from tribes with different inclinations and aspirations. In other words I wanted my people to know that they had a nation (waṭan) as well as a religion (dīn).

I have been greatly criticised by some people because, in the Oujda negotiations I asked with some insistence for a definition of the meaning of independence; this definition was very necessary, because our aim was real independence, unmarked by any blemish. By independence we meant that which would guarantee our complete freedom to determine our development and the independent direction of our affairs, the right to make treaties and to form alliances that we considered to be suitable. I and my brother gave our country the name of the 'Republic of the Rif' (al-Jumhūriya al-Rīfiya) as a sign that we were a state composed of independent tribes in an alliance, and not a representative state with an elected parliament. In fact, in our opinion, the title of 'Republic' (jumhūriya) could not take on its true meaning for some time, because all peoples need a period in which they can form themselves into [a state] with a resolute government, firm sovereignty, and a strong national organisation.

But unfortunately I was understood by only a few individuals who could be counted on the fingers of both hands. On the contrary, even my most faithful supporters, and those of the greatest knowledge and intelligence believed that after the victory had been won I would allow each tribe to return to complete freedom despite their realisation that this would return the country to the worst conditions of anarchy and barbarism.

Religious fanaticism was the greatest cause of my failure even if I do not say that it was the only cause. This is because the shaykhs of the orders have greater influence in the Rif than in Morocco as a whole or in the rest of the countries of the Islamic world. I was incapable of acting without them and was obliged to ask their aid at every turn. At first I tried to win over the masses to my point of view by argument and demonstration, but I met with great opposition from the great families with powerful influence--with the exception of the family of 'Khamlāsha' [sic] whose head was an old friend of my father's. The rest were all my enemies, especially after I spent money from the awqāf to buy supplies for the war. They did not understand that this money could not be spent on a more worthy object than that of the independence of the country.

I do not deny that sometimes I was obliged to make use of religious sensibility in [an attempt] to win political support. Thus, I said that after the Spanish had occupied Ajdir they compelled the evacuation of a part of the village in which there was a mosque, which they did not respect and they made into a stable. When I heard this I ordered three of the qā'ids who were famous for their piety and their bravery to verify the matter for themselves. This tactic of mine doubled the bravery of the fighters, and increased their devotion to myself and my cause.

The truth is that Islam is the enemy of fanaticism and superstitions (khurāqāt). What I know of its fundamentals is enough to make me declare publicly that Islam as I know it in Morocco and Algeria is very far removed from the Islam brought by the great Prophet.

Those who truly or falsely claimed that they were descendants of that pure stock [i.e., that of the Prophet] turned their whole attention to gaining the sympathy of the people for their transitory selves, and set themselves up as idols to be served by the ignorant, and established religious brotherhoods which were transformed into a powerful army to serve their personal ends. But Islam is as far removed as may be from sanctifying individuals because it ordains brotherhood and unity in the face of the enemy and encourages self-sacrifice [lit. 'death'] in the case of freedom and independence. However, the shaykhs of the orders and the leaders of religion tinkered with the Book of God and the sunna of His Prophet in order to satisfy their own longings and to gratify their greed. They took no part in the revolution under the pretext that fighting for the fatherland (waṭan) had no meaning for them and that they would only fight in the cause of the Faith.

I exerted myself to the utmost to free my land from the influence of the shaykhs of the orders who are an obstacle in the way of any sort of freedom and independence. The policy of Turkey pleased me greatly because I knew that the Islamic countries could not be independent unless they freed themselves from religious fanaticism and emulated the people of Europe. But the Rifis did not understand me--which was my misfortune as well as theirs. Thus the shaykhs shook with anger at me when I appeared one day in the uniform of an officer, although I did not do such a thing again.

The shaykhs of the orders were the bitterest enemies both of myself and my country as it advanced. They omitted nothing in their efforts to frustrate my policy, even spreading through the length and breadth of the land that I wanted to follow the example of Turkey, and that that would inevitably lead to giving freedom to women so that they could go around in [European] hats (al-burnita), dressed like French women and aping their customs and so on.

The machinations of these ignorant fanatics convinced me that progress is impossible in any country where they have a strong influence unless it is brought about slowly and through the use of force and violence.

I must declare here and now that I did not find in the Rif the least support for my efforts at reform and that [only] a small group of people in Fez and Algiers understood me, helped me and agreed with my policy because they are in touch with foreigners and know where lies the true good of my country.

In short I came before my time to carry out this work, but I am convinced that my desires will all be realised sooner or later through the force of events and the reversals of time."

The Ideological Explanations of the War

The al-Manār article is an ideological self defence, but that is not the major objection to the picture that it paints. Far more serious is the fact that it is only a very partial account. It makes no mention of bin 'Abd al-Karīm's most important supporters, gives no explanations of how he emerged as the leader or why, does not explain the economic factors of the war and ignores the place of the new state in relation to the long history of Moroccan government, and of Moroccan Sultans' attempts to oppose European interference. Above all, it is a necessarily personal account, presenting bin 'Abd al-Karīm not only as the central figure, but as the only actor on the stage.

What it does do, however, is to raise the essential constitutional and ideological issue which is fundamental to an understanding of the course of the Rif war: the position of Islam within the new state. It was this question which helped determine the relationship of tribes and local groups in the unity of the whole of the Rif and Jibāla. It defined in religious terms the rôle of the new leader, Muḥammad bin

'Abd al-Karīm, and set down the ideological terms of reference of the conflict with the ṭarīqas and of the war itself--for this war could be seen either as one of national liberation or as a jihād against the Christians.

The difference between what is omitted from the al-Manār article and what is commented upon is the essence of the tension between the practicalities of power and the calls of Islamic ideology, which so characterised the course of the war. This was a question which had exercised the minds of Islamic thinkers from the beginning of the nineteenth century, for the relationship between power and religion, and the rôle of Islam in a modern state, is at the heart of the whole movement of reform from Taḥṭāwī onwards, and is specifically a concern of the teachings of 'Abduh and Rīdā.

This relation between religion and state is clearly expressed in the al-Manār article, when bin 'Abd al-Karīm says: "I wanted my people to know that they had a fatherland as well as a religion (la-hum waṭanan kamā la-hum dīnan)."¹ In other words, bin 'Abd al-Karīm is saying, the novelty of the movement which he led was that it provided a frame of reference which included not only the religious community --the 'umma--but also a loyalty to a defined area--the waṭan. The idea of "waṭan" was the product of the reform movement in Egypt, dating back to Taḥṭāwī, although he formulated it to apply to Egypt in order to take account of that country's history as a nation before the Islamic conquest, and of the non-Muslim peoples who lived within its borders.¹ Neither of these two considerations applied to the Rif of course, where there had been no previous history of statehood and where there were few non-Muslims.

¹ Hourani, op. cit., pp. 78-80.

Waṭaniya had other implications for Taḥtāwī, however, concerned with the duties of citizens towards their country--sacrifice, submission to the law, and unity.¹ It is these last two aspects of waṭaniya, submission to the law and unity, that were the most important to bin 'Abd al-Karīm. However, it will be apparent from this thesis that "unity" changed its meaning in the course of the war. At the beginning of the war it referred to an attempt to form an alliance against the Spanish from a number of disparate tribes; later it became a unity that was imposed from above by a single leader, Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Karīm. This process is mirrored in the al-Manār article, where bin 'Abd al-Karīm makes two apparently contradictory statements: he talks first of the need to "work with sincerity and loyalty to form a national unity from tribes with different inclinations and expectations." This implies that the identity of the tribes would be absorbed into that of the new state. On the other hand, he goes on to describe the state as "composed of independent tribes in an alliance", which means the opposite, that the identity of the tribes as separate units was maintained and that each was an acquiescent partner in an alliance. In fact, the majority of tribes were incorporated by force and their continued "alliance" was maintained through the use of coercion. This is recognised by bin 'Abd al-Karīm when he says that even his "most faithful supporters" were wrong to believe "that after the victory had been won, I could allow each tribe to return to complete freedom despite their realisation that this would return the country to the worst conditions of anarchy and barbarism." By using the pronoun "I" in this context, bin 'Abd al-Karim was emphasising the personal control which he reserved to himself as the only person able to make political decisions within the new state.

¹ Ibid., p. 78.

The basis of this unity under his authority was supposed to be religious. Although he made passing references, at the beginning of the war, to the need for local unity based on language--as, for example, when he told the Gaznaya tribe to free John Arnall in 1922 on the grounds that they were Rifi by language and therefore had to obey him--the majority of his propaganda was religious, and the state was supposed to be based on the unity of the Muslims within it. By doing this, he was in line with the modern thinking of people like 'Abduh and Riḍā who rejected the ideas of traditional solidarity based on blood relationship, that had, for example, characterised the tribes of the Sahara in the Middle Ages, who had set up the state of the al-Muwāḥidūn and al-Murābiṭūn. This secular solidarity, 'asabiya, was disliked by Riḍā, for instance, who believed that it perverted the sharī'a.¹ Bin 'Abd al-Karim does not mention the idea of unity through secular bonds in the al-Manār article, instead he talks of the need for unity among tribes who were not connected by any ties of blood, and of Islam which "ordains brotherhood and unity in the face of the enemy" In short, bin 'Abd al-Karim wanted a new state in the Rif, led exclusively by him, but united by the authority of Islam.

The "authority of Islam" meant the imposition or restoration, of the sharī'a. This was the central theme of all the ideas of Islamic reformists. It was one of the main demands upon Mūlāy 'Abd al-Ḥafīẓ when he was given his bay'a, and in the larger Islamic world beyond the borders of Morocco, the reimposition of the sharī'a was the concern of men like Khayr al-Dīn in Tunis, who looked back to the times when the Islamic state was strong and civilised, and accounted for this by pointing to its strict adherence to the law.¹ However, this was a law which was supposedly reinterpreted in the light of modern conditions and which as many (including Rīdā) pointed out, would have to be accompanied by a change in the institutions of Islamic society, particularly those of government and education.² Thus when he talked of the idea of unity in al-Manār, and implied that he looked for the return of the sharī'a, bin 'Abd al-Karīm was in line with the tradition of reformist thinking in Islam.

¹ Ibid., p. 299.

However, as he complains in the al-Manār article, bin 'Abd al-Karīm was opposed in his attempt by local religious leaders. He alleges that the shaykhs of the orders "omitted nothing in their efforts to obstruct my policy." He says that the reason for this opposition was the religious fanaticism of the ṭarīqas. Again, in his attacks on the ṭarīqas he is at one with people like Rīdā, who dismissed the brotherhoods as making their religion "a joke and a plaything".³ Even bin 'Abd al-Karīm's language in al-Manār adopts a similar tone; he refers to the shaykhs who "tinkered with the Book of God". There is, however, another aspect to bin 'Abd al-Karīm's attack on the orders, in al-Manār; he says that the brotherhoods were "transformed into a powerful army to serve their [the shaykhs'] personal ends," that they were his enemies "especially after I spent money from the awqāf to buy supplies for the war." Bin 'Abd al-Karīm does not spell it out, but what he is describing here is a power struggle and a conflict over resources.

¹ Ibid., p. 89.

² Ibid., p. 151.

³ Ibid., p. 225.

The amīr's justification for taking over the resources of the awqāf, or to be exact the justification which he gives in al-Manār, was that they "could not be spent on a more worthwhile object than the defence of the country." However, as we have seen, the country to which he referred was the new Rīfī state ruled over by him, and claiming the obedience of everyone under his authority. It was precisely this waṭan that the shaykhs of the orders rejected: "They took no part in the revolution under the pretext that fighting for the waṭan had no meaning for them and they would only fight in the cause of faith." There is a clear statement here of the difference between bin 'Abd al-Karīm's conception of the new state which he wanted to see in the Rīf, a waṭan, behind defined frontiers and with a defined population, and the 'umma--a far vaguer and more disparate entity which was the only political form, which according to him, the ṭarīqas would recognise.

The very idea of the new state was thus revolutionary in the context of the Rīf. The state to which bin 'Abd al-Karīm referred was not to be the old style of decentralised Moroccan government but one comparable to France and Spain, which ironically were its principal enemies. In other words, his conception of statehood was an idea that was based on his experience of European political structures. It is thus not surprising that this new idea was not understood in the Rīf itself; significantly, bin 'Abd al-Karīm explains that only "a small group of people in Fez and Algiers understood me, helped me and agreed with my policy because they were in touch with foreigners." This was unlikely to appeal to the traditional conservative thinkers in Moroccan society, even to those who were opposed to European intervention in their country. Even at the end of the nineteenth century, al-Nāṣirī, while bemoaning the growing power of the Europeans, had complained that those who wished to emulate their military and technical achievements in order to protect Morocco ran the risk of betraying their faith: "They want to learn about war in order to protect their religion, yet they neglect their religion in the very process of learning."¹ Thus when bin 'Abd al-Karīm claimed that the state would be characterised by its Islamic nature, one that would allow efficient European methods to be used to preserve its independence, he was not answering the paradox which al-Nāṣirī had outlined over twenty years before.

However, the use of new political systems and of European methods in the Rif was obviously of the utmost importance. In fact it was the only practical option that was open to bin 'Abd al-Karīm, since the old structures were clearly quite incapable of sustaining independence. Powerful local leaders, such as al-Raisūlī, had shown themselves willing to cooperate with the colonialists in order to preserve as much of the old political structure--and therefore their own autonomy as possible; even where they, or the orders, had fought the Europeans--as the Sanūsiya had done in Libya--they had shown themselves quite unable to hold back the invaders. The only other alternative was a complete secularisation of the Rīf, as Atatürk attempted in Turkey. Bin 'Abd al-Karīm did not, however, share Atatürk's secularising zeal--he was after all a qāḍī rather than a soldier--although he admired the Turks' efficiency in expelling their enemies--an admiration he shared with Rīḍā, who equally rejected the secularising policies of the Turks.¹ For these reasons the policies proposed by the Salafiya movement were not only desirable from a religious point of view, but necessary for their practical aspects, representing as they did Islam as a force for unity, legitimising the dislike of the ṭarīqas and stating the need to create an Islamic nation-state--a waṭan. Thus the language in which bin 'Abd al-Karīm spoke in the al-Manār article was couched in these terms. However, ideology alone is insufficient to explain the course of the Rīf war, although it provides a very important basis for discussion. The reason for this is quite simple. Muḥammad bin 'Abd al-Karīm was not a theorist but an activist. Certainly he had an interest in the movement of reform in Islam and in the theory of government of an Islamic state. His prime concern, however, was to ensure that the war against the Spanish was continued and that he remained as the leader of the Rīfis. Thus the practical problems as well as the theoretical positions are of vital importance. In fact, the practicalities of power--the imposition of unity, the formation of a state administration, the spreading of the sharī'a, the rôle of bin 'Abd al-Karīm himself in relation to his followers--were in the end more important than the ideas of Islamic reform. Furthermore, a concentration on this aspect of the Rif war shows the extent to which previous commentators have failed to grasp the essential point that it was the daily problems of the war which shaped its course rather than the ideologies behind it.

¹ Al-Nāṣirī, op. cit., Vol. IX, p. 106.

¹ Erwin I.J. Rosenthal, Islam in the Modern National State (Cambridge, 1965), p. 71.

Unity

Bin 'Abd al-Karīm's first remarks in the al-Manār article are directed to the problem of unity. They are an echo of the ideas expressed in his bay'a, which refer to the religious necessity of the unity of the Muslims: "He who wishes to break up the nature of this community, when it is one, cut off his head with a sword, whoever he may be."¹ As we have seen in chapters III and IV, there were overriding political reasons for bringing about unity--quite apart from any belief in its religious desirability. The long history of resistance to the Europeans, from the war of 1859-1860 onwards, had been characterised by its very disparate nature which had led to the ultimate ineffectiveness of all Moroccan action. Even after the imposition of the Protectorate, resistance in northern Morocco had floundered largely because local leaders, al-Raisūllī for example, had been unable to bring enough troops into the field at any one time.

The basis of any sort of unity and resistance in the Rif was, of course, the existence of a stable peace. Provided that the area was divided against itself in internal feuding, the Spanish could rely on there being little opposition. The Spanish policy, therefore, was to undermine stability by trying to prevent the imposition and collection of ḥaqq-fines. In this they were extremely successful and they were able to create great rifts in Rifi society. Certainly there were attempts to form a wider front against the Spanish but by 1919 they had been remarkably unsuccessful.

¹ MAEF, Maroc 517, p. 180. Bay'a of Muḥammad bin 'Abd al-Karīm.

The movement for unity was hampered by the lack of a suitable leader, since the major figure in the north, al-Raisūlī, was unacceptable to the majority of the Rifis and the only alternative candidate, 'Abd al-Mālik was more concerned with fighting the French than the Spanish. Nevertheless, the idea of unity did exist, and a local alliance slowly emerged in the Banū Waryaghāl founded on the reimposition of the ḥaqq-fines. Once these fines had been restored in 1920, they solved not only the problem of order but also provided money to pay for the ḥarkas, a problem which had overcome both al-Raisūlī and 'Abd al-Mālik.

By August 1920 a sizeable coalition had emerged in the Rif formed of elements from five central Rifi tribes, who brought together a considerable ḥarka. However, the problem of leadership still eluded them. Based, as the coalition was, on an alliance, and supported by the ḥaqq-fines which were always liable to break down, the movement was extremely vulnerable. In such situations "alliances are fragile because the commitment of member groups is always tentative and contingent."¹ So the search for a leader began. The first candidate was a man calling himself the Sharif al-Idrīsī who, in September 1920, tried to set himself up as a "Sultan of the Rif". He did not last long, but his appearance was the first mention of the possibility of a new state in the Rif, and after his removal from the scene, the anti-Spanish groups continued to talk of a government in the Rif, free from foreign influence and locally administered.

¹ Amal Vinogradov and John Waterbury, "Situations of Contested Legitimacy in Morocco: an Alternative Framework" in Comparative Studies in Society and History, Vol. 13, no. 1, January 1971, p. 36.

The existence of the movement for unity, and the currency of the idea of an autonomous political unit--it cannot be called a "state" at this stage--in the Rif, is enough to show the inadequacy of a number of common conceptions of the Rif war. In the first place, these ideas of unity were not initiated by Muḥammad bin 'Abd al-Karīm, for his involvement came after these first efforts. This being so, both the "patriotic" Spanish explanation as advanced by Cerdeira, that the idea of an independent nation existed "only in the fantastic imagination of the Aulad al-Jattabi",¹ or Montagne's rather more coherent idea that the Rifi coalition and state was the result of a powerful local individual using the mechanisms of tribal politics to take over first his clan, then his tribe, and then neighbouring tribes in a recreation of the Berber movements of the Middle Ages,² may be seen to be inaccurate. Both the movement for unity, and the coalition, existed before bin 'Abd al-Karīm emerged upon the scene.

However, the fact that it was Muḥammad bin 'Abd al-Karīm and not anyone else who came to lead the Rif through five years of war must be explained.

¹ Cerdeira, op. cit., pp. 72-73.

² Montagne, Révolution, p. 119.

The Eclipse of the Traditional Leadership

Muhammad bin 'Abd al-Karim was by no means the obvious candidate for leadership of the anti-Spanish forces. He possessed no religious legitimacy--he was not a sharif or marabuṭ--his family, while it had a limited local importance in parts of his own tribe, was not powerful.. True, his father had been appointed to the position of qāḍī by several Sultans, and his grandfather had also possessed the same title, but real political authority at that time had rested with the local councils of the a'yān. Above all, his father was seriously compromised by his service with the Spanish as one of their best-rewarded pensioners.

Nevertheless, he had several attributes which were in his favour. In the first place, his father, partly as the result of his friendship with the Spanish, was a rich man. After heavy local pressure by the anti-Spanish alliance had obliged him to change sides, he would naturally occupy a position of some importance in the alliance. When he, 'Abd al-Karim al-Khaṭṭābī, died or was murdered, his eldest son inherited that position. In fact, however, simple wealth had not given his father a commanding position on the anti-Spanish side, and it did not give it to his son. What Muhammad had, and his father had lacked, was a far more informed conception of the way in which the Spanish might be defeated, and a grounding in the ideology of the Salafiya movement which aimed at ensuring the preservation of Muslim independence through the radical application of the sharī'a, and the fostering of Islamic unity. He had a knowledge of European methods and techniques of war, through his contacts with the Spanish army in Melilla and his brother had a technical education in mining. Above all, perhaps, he was an outsider in the sense that his family was not one which had been traditionally powerful in the central Rif. Ross Dunn, writing of the political responses to French colonialism in south-eastern Morocco, has pointed out that:

"Coordinated mass resistance in segmentary lineage societies depended on the emergence of extra-tribal leaders, organisation and ideology persuasive enough to heal over, at least for a time, the natural fissiparousness of political action."¹

In south-eastern Morocco this mass movement never really developed fully. In the Rif it did, and the reason for this was that a suitable leader was found.

This is not to say that bin 'Abd al-Karīm's leadership went unchallenged, for it did not. Significantly, the import of the challenge was that the new leader was not a sharif. Thus, for example, at the very beginning of his command, a group from his own tribe asked Sidi Ḥamīdu to assume the leadership on the grounds that bin 'Abd al-Karīm lacked these traditionally respected origins. Later, al-Raisūlī also would attack the amir on precisely these grounds. Bin 'Abd al-Karīm's, or his supports, made an ideological response to this attack on his origins by invoking Islamic precedent: his bay'a quoted a ḥadīth concerning 'Umar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb saying on his death bed, "You must be strong in faith in God, and listen to and obey the Amīr, be he a slave or an Abyssinian."²

However, bin 'Abd al-Karīm had far more convincing answers to criticism of his unsuitability as leader than this religious or ideological response. In the first place he had led the Muslims to victory over the Spanish, and in the second place he had the undeniable power to impose his will, whether his critics liked it or not.

¹ Dunn, op. cit., p. 268.

² MAEF, Maroc 517, p. 180, Bay'a of Muḥammad bin 'Abd al-Karīm.

The Organisation of the Rif and the Formation of a Makhzan

Bin 'Abd al-Karīm's ability to impose his will and to defeat the Spanish depended on his grasp of the organs of political power in the Rif. He could not do this alone, and was aided by an ever-growing administration. Indeed, part of bin 'Abd al-Karīm's preliminary political campaign to win the leadership of the alliance rested on his promise to bring about a radical reorganisation of Rifi society. Even before Anwāl, he had taken steps to create the nucleus of a regularly paid army, and had carried out a preliminary census of the tribes. In May 1921 he announced that the country would have a "government and a flag", the symbolic representations of the waṭan which bin 'Abd al-Karīm wished to bring into existence to complement the religion of his people. As an emphatic confirmation that the movement against the Spanish was not longer dependent on a tribal alliance but was a centralised opposition led by a single man, aided by powerful supporters, the fragile system of ḥaqq-fines was abolished and replaced by a concentration of justice in the hands of a constituted authority.

All this happened before the defeats of the Spanish in July and August 1921, and at this stage it was admittedly on a very small scale. Nevertheless, when the attack on the Spanish did come it was immediately victorious. However, this success was achieved not only as the result of the growing organisation of the Rif, but because of a simultaneous rising behind the Spanish lines. This rising had been agreed upon in advance, certainly, but that did not imply that the people of the eastern tribes were willing to place themselves under the authority of the new Rifi leader. As a result, when the Spanish had been pushed back as far as Melilla, bin 'Abd al-Karim lost control, yet another pointer that the opposition to the Spanish was not the result of the efforts of Muhammad bin 'Abd al-Karim, but was merely used, channelled, and organised by him.

Thus we may see that there were two aspects to the Rifi movement--the need to defeat the Spanish and the need to create an organisation in the Rif capable of sustaining the opposition. Returning again to Ross Dunn's account of the Moroccan south-east, that author says:

"Under conditions of extreme economic uncertainty, in which no lineage, class, or faction could accumulate sufficient power to control the distribution of resources, competition for them stimulated a profusion of more or less temporary groupings of leaders and followers which coalesced to pursue specific short-run objectives."¹

In northern Morocco, this situation, as we have seen, certainly existed before the formation of a more permanent alliance under bin 'Abd al-Karim. It did not apply after the victories of the summer of 1921. This was because the Rifi leader and his close supporters had enormous reserves of Spanish military supplies which had fallen into their hands, and, after the ransom of the prisoners, a considerable financial superiority over every other individual and group in the area. The short term objectives were surpassed and the coalition moved into a new stage.

It was in this position of overwhelming strength that bin 'Abd al-Karīm was proclaimed as amir, and was able to proceed with a detailed organisation of government in the Rif. He formed a regular army, placed under the command of people who were trained, or at least experienced, in their particular specialities. He set up an administrative system, both to service the army and ensure that it was paid, and to keep order in the countryside, where qā'ids and maḥakmas were set up, and backed by a prison system to punish lesser trouble-makers. This system bore such a close resemblance to that used by the Spanish to dominate the areas that had been forced to submit to their military occupation, that the Ghumārīs referred to the Rifi maḥakmas as "fisīnas, an expression derived from Spanish. In fact, Rifi concerns were remarkably similar to those of the Spanish, to dominate and control areas that did not particularly wish to be either dominated or controlled.

¹ Dunn, op. cit., p. 265.

In an effort to gain legitimacy, by using traditional Moroccan political terms, bin 'Abd al-Karīm described his government as a makhzan. The makhzan was the model of the Moroccan government and one which everyone understood. The Spanish, in their colonisation of northern Morocco, used the same expression to describe their authority. However, the term was not only a terminological convenience but also an accurate description of the new government for like any makhzan it had its ministers and its qā'ids in the tribes. The ministers, many of them members of bin 'Abd al-Karīm's own family, were given specific areas of responsibility, were supported by a developed bureaucracy, and protected by a strong army.

The administrative reforms, the regular army, the taxation which the administration and army combined were able to levy, despite the complaints of those who were taxed, the whole apparatus of nizām which was brought into being in the Rif, were precisely the ends towards which Moroccan Sultans had striven from Muḥammad IV after the Hispano-Moroccan war of 1859-1860, to 'Abd al-'Azīz and 'Abd al-Ḥafīz at the beginning of the twentieth century. It is, therefore, difficult to agree with Abdallah Laroui that the Rif war was simply one of "numerous rural and mountaineer revolts" which bore no relation to the political phenomenon of nationalism in urban Morocco.¹ And it is quite impossible to agree with Abderrahman Youssoufi when he says that bin 'Abd al-Karīm did not try to set up a makhzan in the Rif, and that the idea of the makhzan had already been discredited in the eyes of the people on account of its past failures, and because of its genesis into the vehicle of European colonialism.²

However, in Moroccan history, the setting up of a makhzan was accompanied by the claim by an individual to the Sultanate of Morocco. This did not happen in the Rif, and Muḥammad bin 'Abd al-Karīm made no very serious attempt-- beyond the immediate demands of propaganda to claim that position. The explanation of this lies in the objectives of the Rifi state and his position within it.

Caliphate and Shari'a: the Nature of the Rifi State

The bay'a of bin 'Abd al-Karīm which he was given in January 1923 started with a specific reference to the advantages of the Caliphate: unity, order, morality, the maintenance of the sharī'a, and the Caliphate's opposition to tyranny, and to the rule of non-Muslims. There was nothing new about these ideas. Traditional sunnī Muslim doctrine saw the Caliph as the man who:

¹ Laroui, History, p. 350.

² Youssoufi in Colloque, p. 82.

"should lead the community in peace and war, collect the canonical taxes and supervise the application of the law. He was also the imam, the leader in prayer, and he 'should himself be learned in the law and competent to exercise the power of interpretation.' It was only in this limited sense that he was successor of the Prophet . . . but even in this sense he was indispensable to the community, ruler by divine right, and ruler, in principle, over the whole community: for most, although not all, jurists held that the unity of the umma implied a unity of political authority. 'He who dies without having known the imam of his time is as one who has died in the age of paganism.'"¹

As will be remembered from the discussion in the introductory chapter, the figure of the Caliph in Morocco was combined with that of the Sultan, and the same doctrinal characteristics applied.² Thus reference to the Caliphate at the beginning of bin 'Abd al-Karīm's bay'a indicates that what is coming after is the declaration of a Caliph. And indeed this is precisely what the bay'a says: the Caliphate has come to bin 'Abd al-Karīm, and he was expected to make the sharī'a triumphant, to destroy heretical doctrines and to defeat the Christian enemy.

Was bin 'Abd al-Karīm to be a Caliph then? If Caliph means the ruler of all Muslims then the answer is clearly that he was not. The term must be understood within the context of the war and of the bay'a itself, which makes clear reference only to "The tribes of the Rif and the tribes of the Jibāla".¹ What Muḥammad bin 'Abd al-Karīm stood for was the freedom of the Muslims, the purity of the sharī'a, the opposition to the Christians, in that area--the Rif and the Jibāla (in which the Ghumāra and Sinhāja were assumed to be included) and that area alone. As such he was amīr al-mu'minīn, commander of the faithful, but only of the faithful whom he in fact led. Thus he could quite easily claim that his sovereignty did not impinge on that of the Sultan in Morocco because he was only the effective leader of the faithful in the north, although the Sultan to the south was under the control of the French. In other words, the intention of the bay'a was to organise in the Rif the conditions of a Caliphate, where the sharī'a might be preserved and strengthened, beyond the control of the European armies, but on a local level and within defined frontiers. As Magali Morsy has put it, "Where in 1922 was the Dār el-Islām if it was not in the Rif?"² for the rest of Morocco (as well as most of the rest of the Islamic world) had by then fallen victim to European expansion.

¹ Hourani, op. cit., p. 5. It will be noted that virtually the same phrase as that quoted by Hourani here was used in the bay'a of bin 'abd al-Karīm, i.e., "A man who dies and has not made a bay'a dies in ignorance" MAEF, Maroc, 517, p. 180.

² As Lahbabi has shown (op. cit., p. 27).

It is obvious that it is impossible to separate the independence of the Islamic state from the maintenance of the sharī'a. This is as true of the Rif as anywhere else. The sharī'a could only be maintained if independence was maintained, and that could only be done if unity was ensured. The key to unity was the sharī'a, the only way to supersede the fragile system of ḥaqq-fines, and the symbol of the unity of the 'umma and the waṭan. Again we see the way in which ideological desires and practical needs were interdependent.

¹ MAEF, Maroc 517, p. 180, Bay'a of Muḥammad bin 'Abd al-Karīm.

² Magali Morsy, "Actualité d'Abd el-Krim" in Colloque, p. 394.

So, the maintenance of the leadership of Muḥammad bin 'Abd al-Karīm depended upon his ability to control the legal structure of the Rif. His claim to legitimacy as amīr was based on the enforcement of the sharī'a, and that enforcement was a political necessity just as much as it was his own personal desire. That is not to say that concern with the sharī'a was purely the result of political opportunism. The principal agents in the campaign to create a "moral society" in the Rif, Bū Laḥya and al-Shargī, wanted to enforce the sharī'a in every area of social activity, and not just for socially disruptive crimes of violence and theft. Thus, for example, as shown in chapter IX, a man was imprisoned for not paying his debts, another for promising to marry a woman when that was forbidden by the sharī'a, another for assaulting his wife, and yet another for spreading malicious gossip. At the same time the creation of just such a "moral society" increased the influence of the state authority and its power over the lives of every individual in the country.

The maintenance of political power and authority in the Rif was, of course, bin 'Abd al-Karīm's prime concern. Quite apart from the desire of most rulers to remain in power, without that authority his other objectives, defeating the Spanish and maintaining the law, could not be achieved. Indeed, the vast majority of the people who were imprisoned were punished because in some way--by spying or treachery--they had infringed, or acted against, the authority of bin 'Abd al-Karīm. Now the inseparability of the shari'a from the authority of the amir becomes clear. If bin 'Abd al-Karim was fighting the war against the Spanish to protect the shari'a and to preserve the independence of a Muslim state, then any opposition to him was irreligious. It was precisely in these terms that he attacked 'Amar bin Hamidu and al-Raisuli. The authority for his claim, in legal terms at least, was the bay'a which had given him the position and duties of the Caliphate within the area of the Rifi state.

Thus it may be seen that bin 'Abd al-Karim saw his rôle as that of amir al-mu'minin. His relationship with the "faithful", who in theory had bestowed that position upon him by their bay'as, is therefore of the utmost importance.

Ruler and People

According to the theory of the Caliphate, or Sultanate, in Morocco, the ruler's position was the result of his recognition by the 'ulamā'. In fact, of course, the bay'a of bin 'Abd al-Karim, like that of any sovereign was more the recognition of a fait accompli, the already existing power of the ruler, rather than his nomination to office. Once in power, again according to traditional Islamic theory, the ruler should in some way consult the leaders of the community--a process known as shūra--and be advised by them. However, as Hourani points out, "there was no clear idea who exactly should be consulted . . . and how far the ruler should be bound by what they said."¹ As we have seen from the discussion of Moroccan political life in the Introduction, these ideas of consultation and "election" have been used by more recent Moroccan political writers such as Lahbabi to justify the idea of a democratic monarchy in that country.¹ Arguing along the same lines as Lahbabi, 'Allāl al-Fasī has stated that in the Rīfī state there existed democratic structures through which the ruler was directly responsible to the people.² On the other hand, bin 'Abd al-Karīm himself, in the article in al-Manār, put the opposite view quite bluntly saying that the Rīfī was "not a representative state with an elected parliament."³ These are two descriptions of what was alledgedly the same system, and they are contradictory. The truth, as ever, lies between them.

¹ Hourani, op. cit., p. 6.

'Allāl al-Fasī is quite correct to say that there was an assembly of sorts in the Rīf; he is wrong to assert that it had any authority over the amīr. As the discussion of the rôle of the majlis al-'umma in chapter IX has shown, its function was advisory. It could refer things to the amīr but like all the other organs of state, and their officials--ministers, military leaders, qā'ids, and local meetings of the a'yān of tribes, it could only offer him suggestions.

Muḥammad bin 'Abd al-Karīm would seem by nature to be an autocrat. As we have seen in chapter V, even before Anwāl, when he was criticised in the mosque, he immediately silenced his opponent. In any event, if he was not an autocrat by nature, he soon became one through force of circumstance. If the Rifi alliance was to hold together and be formed into something more durable, then it would have to be he who made the decisions, and he who maintained unity. As he himself explained in the al-Manār interview, he experienced considerable difficulty in convincing even his supporters that "I would allow each tribe to return to complete freedom despite their realisation that this would return the country to the worst conditions of anarchy and barbarism."¹ The responsibility for avoiding the return to anarchy was bin 'Abd al-Karīm's alone, at least in his own eyes. Certainly the al-Manār article deals solely with what he thought was the correct course of action, and how he as an individual was opposed in his plans by powerful and irreligious vested interests.

¹ Lahbabi's book (already cited) is one of the most cogent examples of this in Moroccan political writing. It is, of course, a fairly standard interpretation of "shūra" as a whole, and reformist thinking as developed by 'Abduh and others whereby shūra gradually came to mean parliamentary democracy. C.f. Hourani, op. cit., p. 144, and Rosenthal, op. cit., pp. 43, 101.

² Al-Fasī, op. cit., pp. 121-122.

³ Al-Manār, cited article.

The same view of the individual rôle of the amīr was held by his supporters in the Rif. The al-Maṭālsī shaykhs encountered by Vincent Sheean in 1924 saw the whole war in terms of the victory of "our lord", who was the "Sultan of Islam".² The title itself is significant for it is an echo of the claim to be the leader of the faithful. This puts into perspective bin 'Abd al-Karīm's own remarks on accepting his bay'a, that he was not a king but (something much more powerful) "the collective voice of everyone"--the popularly chosen leader of the faithful whose position depended on his religious legitimacy, the upholding of the sharī'a, and on general approval. Thus not only was any opponent disobeying a leader with religious authority but the representative of society at large.....

¹ Ibid.

² Sheean, Adventures, p. 47.

³ Skīraj, op. cit., p. 81.

This is not to say that bin 'Abd al-Karīm's autocracy was necessarily heavy handed, for although he was not obliged either in theory, or in fact, to take anyone's advice he frequently did so. The people of Burid in the Gaznaya, as we have seen in chapter IX, did in fact receive the qā'id whom they wanted, and after the majlis al-'umma objected to Qāḍī al-Shims, someone else was appointed. It was often easier for bin 'Abd al-Karīm to get his way by consent rather than by force. Nevertheless, his authority went very deep into the lives of his people, and the agents of his state were able to intervene in personal matters, between husband and wife for example.

It may be seen then, that bin 'Abd al-Karīm was not a tyrant ruling by force alone, rather an able politician acting in a highly autocratic manner, but sensitive to at least some of the aspirations of his people. Furthermore, it was a position which was widely affirmed by those people, who saw in him an effective leader who would bring them to victory and ensure a stable society. This more complicated picture of the amīr, explains the enigmatic character of a ruler who was forever trying to balance the political and military demands of the moment, with the more long-term need to remain in power, to keep control over his subjects, while at the same time trying not to alienate their support too much, through the demands he made on them for service, taxation and obedience. It explains also the swiftly changing nature of his propaganda, from his claims to represent Islamic unity and the wishes of his people, to the need to undertake "negative" propaganda--the use of terror, arrest, imprisonment and execution.

However, it must be said that bin 'Abd al-Karim was not a single figure ruling over a united country. Like all rulers he relied to a very large extent on individual supporters, and was opposed by other individuals and groups. Too great a concentration on the personality of the amir tends to lessen the attention given to the motives of his supporters, and above all, those of his opponents.

Bin 'Abd al-Karim, the Orders and Locally Powerful Leaders

The main objection to an exclusive concentration on the rôle of Muḥammad bin 'Abd al-Karim is that it gives the impression that he was supreme in the state and that everyone else was subordinated to him and to his organisation. This was a goal that could not possibly have been achieved. Bin 'Abd al-Karim was faced with the same problems that had confronted previous Moroccan Sultans who attempted to enforce their control in areas where it had previously been weak.

Edmund Burke has pointed to the obstacles placed in the way of the Moroccan Sultan in his attempts to create a stronger unity in the country, under his leadership:

"... the centralizing drive of the makhzan antagonized the provincial notables and incurred the opposition of the religious brotherhoods and zawiyas, whose interests were threatened by salafiyya-inspired reforms."¹

It is clear that bin 'Abd al-Karim's state was opposed precisely by those same orders and individuals. It is equally clear from the material put forward in this thesis that bin 'Abd al-Karim's opponents were motivated not so much by "religious fanaticism", as the amir himself claims in the al-Manār article, but by considerations of power and influence. It is simply untrue to state that it was only the shaykhs of the orders who opposed him, or that they all opposed him with the exception of the one family of the Akhamlīshīn.

¹ Burke, Prelude, p. 215.

In the first place, the Rīfī movement was supported by a large number of shaykhs from religious brotherhoods who were appointed as qā'ids and pashas in the Rīfī administration, and one of them, a Nāsirī sharīf from the region near Tangier, was one of the main leaders of the expansion of the war into the north-west. There were others, such as Sīdī Ḥamīdu of Snāda, for example, who, while they did not actively support bin 'Abd al-Karīm's authority, did not oppose it. Certainly Sīdī Ḥamīdu, with a consistent record of fighting both the French and the Spanish before the Rīf war, and of helping the movement at the very beginning, could not be described as a traitor to Islam, and despite his withdrawal from overt political and military activity, his very neutrality allowed him to perform useful service to bin 'Abd al-Karīm as a mediator.

In the second place, some of the most ferocious and determined opposition came from an alliance of three locally powerful individuals, 'Amar bin Ḥamīdu, al-Ḥājj Bil-Qīsh, and 'Abd al-Mālik, of whom only the last had even the most tenuous claim to religious prestige, through his grandfather, the Algerian 'Abd al-Qādir. The others were secular leaders trying to protect their own local authority and prestige. If this meant cooperating with the Spanish or the French in order to win for themselves a measure of local autonomy and importance, then, in the manner of al-Raisūlī, they were quite prepared to do so. What they did not want was to be forced into a position of subordination to a powerful centralised state like the Rif.

Two prominent religious figures, al-Raisūlī and 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Darqāwī, did oppose bin 'Abd al-Karīm and their incorporation into the Rifī state. Their objection, as bin 'Abd al-Karīm says in the al-Manār article, was to the use of "their" ḥabus property for the purposes of the state. However, since they were religious figures, and since the basis of the Rifī state, as laid down in the bay'a of its amīr, was also religious--to protect Islam, and to maintain the sharī'a--the propaganda which accompanied the clash between the two sides was expressed in religious terms. Thus Bin 'Abd al-Karīm attacked al-Raisūlī as the man who had allowed the Spanish into the Jibāla, and al-Raisūlī attacked bin 'Abd al-Karīm as irreligious because he made war on his brother Muslims.

This is not to say that the attacks on the ṭarīqas were entirely the result of a conflict over power. Clearly, in the Salafiya interpretation of Islam, the orders were irreligious, and bin 'Abd al-Karīm objected to them on this ground as well. But it is always important to realise, in discussing the events of the Rif war, that the concern for the sharī'a, though quite genuine in itself, had the additional advantage that if it were brought into effect it would further strengthen the political position of bin 'Abd al-Karīm.

The confusion over religious motives vanishes in the case of 'Amar bin Ḥamīdu and Bil-Qīsh. Here, the extent of the play for power is absolutely plain. The only terms of reference of these two local leaders were to their own personal advantage. Even their alliance was subject to this, and when it suited him, 'Amar bin Ḥamīdu betrayed his former ally Bil-Qīsh to cooperate for a short time with bin 'Abd al-Karīm. The same tactics were used by a lesser figure, Muḥammad Bū Qaddur, who tried to ensure his position by simultaneously backing both the Rifi state and the Spanish. Once again, the preservation of the power of an individual was a matter of overriding concern.

This is not to pass judgement on these individuals. By acting in this way they were protecting not only their own power but also the livelihood of their families and the local groups to which they belonged. After all, the penalty for making a mistake, and aligning themselves too closely with a losing party, either in the conflict between the Rifis and the Spanish, or between the Rifi state and 'Amar b. Ḥamīdu, could be disastrous. Houses and crops would be burned and animals confiscated or destroyed. Thus we may see that Ross Dunn's point about south-eastern Morocco applied equally in the Rif:

" . . . individuals, local communities, and alliances defended themselves, not only against Europeans, but also against the pressures and importunings of kings, . . . saints, prophets, and other meddlers who would corner them into taking risks and making sacrifices dangerously incompatible with the urgent imperatives of protecting land, water, crops, and herds."¹

Such people had to be coerced into cooperation with the Rifis, and so the Rifi state became an aggressive and expansionist force.

¹ Dunn, op. cit., p. 32.

Rifi "Imperialism"?

As we have seen, the efforts to form an anti-Spanish movement in the Rif preceded the rise of Muḥammad 'Abd al-Karīm to lead it. Equally, the people of the Jibāla and the Ghumāra did not feel the need to depend on the Rifis for leadership.

There had been a history of opposition to the Spanish in the Jibāla, which grew after the occupation of Shāwin in 1920. This opposition, while fierce, was spasmodic in nature and centred on the Akhmās tribe. Although they received help from Rifi harkas even before the rise of bin 'Abd al-Karīm, they never put themselves under any obligation to the Rifis, and such cooperation never inhibited local freedom of action.

This same feeling still existed when the Spanish were expelled from the Jibāla in 1924. However, times had changed. Now the tribes were not allowed to revert to their previous conditions of independence and "anarchy". For Muḥammad bin 'Abd al-Karīm expanded the Rifi state into the area. The Rifis set up maḥakmas and telephone lines, built roads, imposed taxes and confiscated the ḥabūs property. When the Akhmās protested, their rebellion was put down with great ferocity. In fact, the Rifi army behaved as an army of occupation, and their methods as we have seen were remarkably similar to those of the Spanish.

The Jibālīs had to endure this situation but they were never happy about the occupation, and when bin 'Abd al-Karīm surrendered, and the Rifi state collapsed, they drove out or killed all the Rifi officials they could find.

The reasons for this aggressive expansionism are not hard to find. The presence of the Spanish in the west meant that they were a threat to the Rifis' rear. Once they had been driven out, however, bin 'Abd al-Karim could not tolerate the presence of disorder on the edge of the state which he ruled, for it allowed a base for those who were opposed to him and his supporters, and provided the manpower for an alliance to resist the Rifis. In addition, a reversion to the old political system of the tribes, in the newly "liberated" territory, would have negated the whole concept of order and shari'a on which the Rifi state was based.

Thus by 1925, the term "Rifi state" was in one sense a misnomer, since it included an area far larger than the Rif itself. On the other hand it was a Rifi state in the sense that it was a territory which had largely been occupied by the Rifi government, with backing from Rifi troops. It was far beyond the stage when bin 'Abd al-Karim, in 1922, could appeal to the Gaznays to obey his orders because they were Rifi by language. It may be seen, therefore, that the Rifi state was held together, not by secular 'asabiya based on a common Berber tradition, but on a mixture of force and religious propaganda, the most prominent characteristic of all the political action of the Rif war. Similarly it may be seen that this was an attempt to go beyond the limiting factors of tribal unity to create a far wider unity over the whole of northern Morocco, supported by a technical superiority and an administration the like of which had not been seen before in the area.

However, this unity brought with it new dangers, because it was eventually bound to come into conflict with the French and to impinge on their zone.

The War with the French and the Relations with the Sultan

Involvement with the French was, according to bin 'Abd al-Karīm himself, a step which he wished to avoid.¹ However, as we saw in chapter XII, he had great difficulty in preventing it. There were a number of reasons for the eventual expansion to the south.

The first reason, and the simplest to explain, was a question of economics. By occupying the Wargha the French cut the Rif off from a vital source of grain supplies. Thus, in order to maintain the economy of the Rif, there was bound to be at least a limited involvement with the French.

More complex reasons exist, however. Bin 'Abd al-Karīm's government and the movement which it led was a prisoner both of its own propaganda and of its very success. In the pro-Rifi propaganda, in the posters on the walls of the mosques in Tetuan, for example, and in the bay'a given to bin 'Abd al-Karīm, there were calls to protect Islam, and to promote the peace and well being of the Muslims. Again in the posters in Tetuan, and in the propaganda circulating in the Rif, great emphasis was laid on the economic aspects of colonialism--the loss of land and property, as well as the threat to Islam as a religion. As a result, Islam came to represent, not only a religious system of government, but also a symbol of economic and cultural independence to complement political and religious freedom. However, if this claim was to be made for freedom from Spanish rule, it was logically, and from the point of view of the consistency of the propaganda, difficult to avoid it being made for independence from French rule. And since many of the people living on the southern boundaries of the Rifi state were far more at risk from the French than from the Spanish, they were liable to make strong efforts to fight the other colonialist nation to the south.

¹ Roger-Mathieu, op. cit., pp. 133-140.

In addition, a great deal of the legitimacy of bin 'Abd al-Karim's rule depended on his success. His following among Sheean's acquaintances in the al-Maṭālsa tribe, for example, depended very largely on his prestige as a war leader. If it could be seen that he was completely unwilling to defend people against the French, then that prestige would thereby be diminished.

For these reasons, it was inevitable that the Rifi state would be drawn into conflict with the French. Bin 'Abd al-Karim was well aware of this, and said as much when he accepted his bay'a. He was not keen to bring about this involvement, however, but pressure on him grew. By the time the Spanish had been expelled from the Jibāla, he had no more excuses to avoid an invasion of the south. As we saw in chapter XII the enthusiasm of his local commanders for military action against the French was overwhelming.

However, before the attack took place it was planned with great care, and a strong defence line was prepared for Rifi forces to fall back upon. In other words it was intended to be a limited campaign, aimed at ensuring the continued support of the Rifi commanders and troops, and at taking over vital economic areas south of the Rif, but also a campaign which would allow the Rifis to withdraw to previously prepared defence lines. It was not the result of the "vague nationalist ideology" of the Rifi leadership as Fleming puts it,¹ but of the strong nationalist feelings of the main body of the Rifi army. To this extent, the Rifi state was based on popular consent in the sense that its leadership was the prisoner of the desire of the people to undertake the invasion of the French zone. Once it is seen in this way, the virulent propaganda campaigns in Fez may be understood in a different light. The letter to the 'ulamā' of the Qarawiyīn laid great emphasis on the superiority of the Rifi leader, Muḥammad bin 'Abd al-Karīm compared with the succession of past Sultans and Pretenders to the Moroccan throne. He, bin 'Abd al-Karīm, claimed the authority of the Caliphate, an authority that had already been claimed for him before, in his bay'a. What he said in the letters was not that he wished to be Sultan over all Morocco, but that the people of Fez should cooperate with him out of Islamic solidarity to ensure that the limited Dār al-Islām that existed in the Rif was not destroyed. He alone had been able to carry out the duties in which past Sultans had failed. It is for this reason that the attacks on the Sultanate were limited only to the period of the attack on the French zone --there are no examples of them in the Rif itself--and they were for the limited purposes of the moment.

However, the idea of war of limited extent against the French or one whose main aim was to defeat the Spanish alone raises fundamental questions about whether or not this war may accurately be described as a jihād.

¹ Fleming, op. cit., p. 239.

Jihād or a War of Independence?

Traditionally, jihād implied a war against non-Muslims, to extend the area of the Dār al-Islām. However, by the nineteenth century this had become a practical impossibility, at least as far as conflict with the Europeans was concerned. War "in the cause of God" became an attempt to protect the already existing boundaries of the Muslim world, rather than to extend them. This revised doctrine of jihād, the product of circumstance, was adopted on an ideological level by the theorists of the Salafiya movement. Rīda, for example defined jihād as being lawful only to protect Islam, but that any attempt to compel Christians to become Muslims would infringe the principle of toleration of the "people of the Book".¹

Thus jihād was limited both in theory and in practice. The Rīf war was also limited in its scope by the practicalities of the situation. This does not mean that the Rīf war was therefore simply a jihād with a limited scope. Indeed, bin 'Abd al-Karīm himself denied that it was a jihād at all: He wrote to Gabrielli, the French organiser of the Oujda conference:

"I wish to state, since I am accused of leading a holy war, that this is incorrect to say the least. We no longer live in the Middle Ages, nor at the times of the Crusades. Quite simply we wish to be independent and to be governed only by God."²

By saying this bin 'Abd al-Karīm was not just referring to the impracticality of the idea of a war to expand Islam. He was also talking of two other considerations; firstly the limited nature of the war itself, and secondly its objectives. This war was not only concerned with Islam but also with nationalism. As he himself put it in al-Manār, "waṭan" as well as "dīn". That, however, was a concept not easily grasped by the traditional leaders of Moroccan society. The orders refused to help, according to bin 'Abd al-Karīm, "under the pretext that fighting for the fatherland had no meaning for them and that they would only fight in the cause of the Faith."¹

¹ Hourani, op. cit., p. 237.

² Gabrielli, op. cit., p. 85.

The concept of nationalism was not only foreign to the ideas of the amīr's opponents. Many of his followers had the same difficulties of understanding. The shaykhs whom Vincent Sheean met among the al-Maṭālsa tribe, talked of driving all the Christians from Morocco, and then reconquering Spain as well.² For them jihād was hardly a war of defence. Akhrīrū, as his letter referred to in chapter XII shows, was motivated by a strong feeling of hate for the Spanish because they were Christians. Nevertheless, the people's feelings had much in common with those of bin 'Abd al-Karīm. Like him they wished to protect their land and their religion from an enemy that both threatened to destroy their economy and society, and to dominate their religious freedom. However, bin 'Abd al-Karīm's vision went beyond this, and looked forward to the creation of a strong, centralised and modern state founded on the precepts of Islamic law. For both these differing points of view there existed the double edged problem of what was desirable and what was possible. Bin 'Abd al-Karīm wished to create a modern Salafiya-inspired state, but this, given the political and social conditions in the Rif and northern Morocco was a goal that was impossible to achieve since the majority of his followers neither understood nor accepted it. On the other hand many, perhaps the bulk, of those followers wanted to attack the "Christians" wherever they might be on Moroccan soil, but this was also impossible given the overwhelming strength of the European armies. It is this tension between the desirable and the possible, on the part of both ruler and people, which gives the Rif war its multi-faceted and confused appearance. Events, policies and ideas had relevance on different levels. Reform of the law was desirable from both a religious and a political point of view: it guaranteed both the functioning of the sharī'a and a centralised unity. The call to attack the Spanish, was the response to that country's immediate threat to the independence of the Rif and also a response to the deep-rooted dislike felt by many Rifis for the Christians. Unity itself, the fundamental pivot of all the political activity of the Rif war was both an organisational necessity and a desirable thing from the religious point of view. In the end, the Rifi attempt to secure independence failed, and yet it was marked by considerable political, military and social achievements.

¹ Al-Manār, cited article.

² Sheean, Adventures, p. 47.

"I came before my time"

We have seen a number of reasons why the war was lost by the Rifis: the economy, the vastly superior might of the Spanish and French armies, the internal opposition to bin 'ABd al-Karīm, all these played their part.

These are not the reasons which al-Manār gives for the failure however. Basing his remarks on the interview with bin 'Abd al-Karīm, the commentator in that journal notes the amīr's criticism of the "religious fanaticism" of his opponents and his complaints that he was not understood. The al-Manār writer accepts without question the underlying assumption of the article that the whole of the Rīf war was entirely the work of bin 'Abd al-Karīm, and then proceeds to attack him for his personal failure. Bin 'Abd al-Karīm's reliance on European methods to defeat the Spanish, it is argued,

"weakened the great bravery of his people. He was so infatuated with the appearance of European civilisation that he wished to introduce them [European methods] in a way which weakened the spiritual strength of his people . . ."¹

The author goes on to castigate bin 'Abd al-Karīm for the purely imaginary crime of wishing to emulate Atatürk, abolish the Caliphate and set up a secular state. Al-Manār was of course opposed to the very idea of such developments; but so, as we have seen, was bin 'Abd al-Karīm, for his efforts were directed towards the imposition of the sharī'a and the strengthening of Islam in the Rīf. The ill-informed comments of al-Manār would not be very important in understanding the Rīf war if it were not for the fact that they underline one of its most important aspects: the conflict between political desires and practical necessities. For instance, al-Manār dismisses bin 'Abd al-Karīm's remarks about religious fanaticism in the following manner:

"What Muḥammad bin 'Abd al-Karīm calls 'religious fanaticism' and what he criticises and found no way to suppress, except to copy the Kamalist Turks, is not fanaticism of religion, but ignorance which is cured not by bridling its strength, but by spreading knowledge."¹

¹ Al-Manār, cited article; remarks of an unnamed commentator.

This analysis completely fails to recognise that the real problem of the Rifi state and of its leader was the question of time. With the Spanish on the edge of the Rif, there simply was not enough time to undertake an educational programme of the type recommended by al-Manār. It is for this reason that the Rif war does not entirely lend itself to analysis in the light of Salafiya theory alone. Certainly the theories of that movement had some relevance to the war but there were other, more pressing, factors as well. The people had to be organised rapidly and order imposed by force, if necessary, in order to carry out the first objective, the defeat of the Spanish.

Thus it is the achievement of unity and order under a centralised authority, the creation of a state in the Rif, which becomes the outstanding achievement of the war. There can be no doubt that a state was formed in the Rif. Danziger, writing of 'Abd al-Qādir's resistance to the French in Algeria quotes a definition of "state" which applies equally to the entity headed by bin 'Abd al-Karīm:

"A body of people permanently occupying a defined territory and politically organized under a sovereign government almost entirely free from external control and possessing coercive power to maintain order in the community."²

The Rifi state fulfilled all these conditions; its territory was defined, by conquest; it was politically organised with detailed administration; neither the Spanish nor any other outsider had control over its policies; its government could and did use its coercive power to maintain order.

¹ Ibid.

² Webster's Third International Dictionary (Unabridged), 1971, quoted in Danziger, op. cit., p. 204.

Yet what happened in the Rif between 1921 and 1926 was a new event in Moroccan history only in so far as it was a successful attempt to carry out policies which had been tried before, but which had failed. Successive Sultans had attempted to change the nature of Moroccan society and to impose the sharī'a, to organise a trained and regular army, to reform the administration and to increase the authority of the central government. Only in the Rif were these objectives achieved. Thus Muḥammad bin 'Abd al-Karīm, and the Rifi state which he led, was a new and successful phase in a continuing process.

We are thus drawn back to the amīr's statement that "I came before my time to carry out this work but I am convinced that my desires will all be realised sooner or later, through the force of events and the reversals of time."¹ What bin 'Abd al-Karīm was trying to do was to ensure the independence of a part of Morocco. It was not a large part of that country, but all his other hopes for religious reform, social change, and development were dependent on the fulfilment of that aim. His was an aim larger than that of many, perhaps the majority of his followers, who simply aimed at independence. Nevertheless, both he and they came nearer to achieving their desires than the inhabitants of any part of Morocco, or any Moroccan leader, had done since the European threat to that country's independence had begun in the middle of the previous century. Certainly they were bound to fail at that time, for the forces of two modern European states were ranged against them. But the five years which they did survive showed how much further they had advanced down the path of organisation and unity than all the attempts that had been made before. No movement of rural resistance this; the Rif war, ^{was} no less than an attempt to put into effect the ideas of Islamic unity, to give practical shape to the attempted reforms of four generations of Moroccan Sultans.

¹ Al-Manār, cited article.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Archival Material

Servicio Histórico Nacional, Madrid

Archives of the Ponencia de Africa. Contains the papers, intelligence reports, and military operations reports of the Spanish Army in Morocco. Divided into three sections representing the affairs of the Comandancias Generales of Melilla, Ceuta, and Larache. The first two have been used very extensively for this thesis, the last section --Larache--is less interesting and of less relevance.

Archives of the Ministerio de Asunto Exteriores, Madrid, Spain. Very little on the Rif war, but a certain amount on its diplomatic repercussions, scattered through many different series.

Archives of the Sección de Africa, Biblioteca Nacional de España, Madrid, Spain. Contains the valuable collection of private papers amassed by Tomás García Figueras, a Spanish military administrator in Morocco. Many unpublished sociological and historical descriptions of individual tribes, official documents, otherwise unobtainable published material, and a large collection of newspaper cuttings.

Archives of the Ministère des Affaires Etrangères, Paris France

Maroc Nouvelle Serie. Documents pertaining to the Rif war, file numbers 517-520 contain a very large selection of captured Rifi documents; extremely valuable. Also files relating to "Zone Espagnole" and the files of "Afrique serie K; Affaires Musulmanes"

Archives of the Ministère de la Guerre, Service Historique de l'Armée de la Terre, Vincennes, France Series Maroc E contains military intelligence material on the Rif war.

Public Records Office, London, United Kingdom

Foreign Office Material, particularly the series FO 371 containing consular reports, correspondence and other material.

India Office Library, London, United Kingdom

Series L/P & S (Political and Secret papers). Contains information about the political links between the Muslim Community in India, and the Rif, and the agitation in favour of the Rifis in India.

The Times Archives, The Times newspaper, London, United Kingdom

The Harris Papers. Contains a certain amount of the personal papers of Walter B. Harris, The Times correspondent in Morocco, and his private communications to his editors.

Library Material

Biblioteca Nacional de España, Hemeroteca Nacional. The Spanish National Newspaper Library. A great many of the newspapers published in Spain are not available in this library, and some are to be found in those mentioned below.

Hemeroteca Municipal de Madrid, Madrid, Spain. The municipal newspaper library of Madrid. In some respects rather better than the national one.

Hemeroteca Municipal de Ceuta, Ceuta, North Africa, contains an incomplete selection of the Spanish newspapers of that city and the Jibāla.

Biblioteca Municipal de Melilla, Melilla, North Africa contains the full collection of El Telegrama del Rif.

Other libraries used were the Bibliothèque Nationale du Maroc, Rabat, Morocco; The Archives Nationales du Maroc, Rabat, Morocco; the British Library, London and Boston Spa, Yorkshire, United Kingdom; and the Library of the School of Oriental and African Studies, London, United Kingdom.

Unpublished Material

Anonymous

Jefes Rebeldes en 1925-1927 El Talib Mohammed Chauni, Typescript in B.N.E.S. de A. dated 1927.

Ayache, Germain

"Les Origines de la Guerre du Rif", unpublished Ph.D thesis, Paris (Sorbonne) 1979. This thesis was only presented when my thesis was being written up. It was not possible to consult it, but it is concerned with the period before the Rif war.

- Cab Reb 1913-1927 See below, Zona de Protectorado Español
- Capaz Montes, Fernando O. Cabecillas Rebeldes en Gomara desde 1913 a 1924, Typed MS in B.N.E.S. de A, no date.
- Fleming, Shannon Earl "Primo de Revera and Abd el-Krim the Struggle in Spanish Morocco 1923-1927" unpublished Ph.D. thesis, University of Wisconsin, 1974
- Intervención Militar de Larache Kabila de Beni Aros, Memoria 1928, Sidi Ali, 1928, typed and bound MS in B.N.E.S. de A.
Kabila de Sumata, Zaaora, 1928, typed bound MS in B.N.E.S. de A.
Memoria de las Kabilas de Beni-Isof y Beni-Scar, typed bound MS in B.N.E.S. de A.
- Jamous, Raymond "Relation d'Ordre entre Segmentarité et Rapports d'Autorité chez les Iqar'iyen (Rif Oriental) avant le Protectorat", unpublished paper given at Durham Conference on Modern Moroccan Studies, 1977
- Montagne, Robert "Quelques Aspects de la Transformation Politique du Rif 1895-1925" unpublished Military Intelligence report dated Fez, 29 October 1925 in SHAT Maroc Fez 156 Renseignements sur les Chéfs Indigènes
- Oficina Central de Intervención y Tropas Indígenas de Tetuán Datos Sobre los Principales Cabecillas Rebeldes de la Cábila de Anyera, n.d., typed MS in B.N.E.S. de A.
- Oficina Central de Intervención y Tropas Jalifianas de Tetuán Datos Sobre los Principales Cabecillas Rebeldes de la Cábila del Hauz, n.d., typed MS in B.N.E.S. de A.
- Seddon, David "Political Forms and Economic Structures in Precolonial Morocco", unpublished paper
- Skiraj, Ahmad "Al-ḡall al-warif fi muḡābara al-Rif 'ām 1443-1924" unpublished MS in National Archives, Rabat.
- Zona de Protectorado Español en Marruecos Cabecillas Rebeldes de 1913 á 1927, typed MS in B.N.E.S. de A.

Published Material

N.B. Only works which have direct bearing on this thesis or have been used are listed here.

Anonymous

Historial de la Harka Melilla
Años 1924-1925, Melilla, Tipografía la Hispana, n.d. (but pre-1930)

Anonymous

"Jahl zu'amā' al-muslimin wamafāsīd ahl al-ṭuruq wal-shurafā' wa kawnhum sababan li-fashl za'im al-Rif al-Maghrabi" in al-Manār,
pt. 8, Vol. 27, 1344-1345 AH, pp. 630-634. Contains the text of the interview with bin 'Abd al-Karīm in which he gives his explanation for his defeat.

Anonymous (ed.)

Abd el-Krim et la République du Rif. Actes du Colloque International d'Etudes Historiques et Sociologiques 18-20 Janvier 1973, Paris, Maspero, 1976. The text of the papers given at the conference on the Rif war held in Paris, referred to in citations as Colloque

Anonymous (ed.)

Al-Munjid fī-l-Luġha w-al-a'lam,
Beirut, Dār al-Mashriq, 1973

Abun Nasr, Jamil

A History of the Maghrib, Cambridge,
Cambridge University Press, 1971, referred to in citations as History
The Tijaniyya, London, O.U.P., 1965

"The Salafiyya Movement in Morocco:
the Religious Bases of the Moroccan Nationalist Movement" in Hourani,
Albert (ed.), St. Anthony's Papers
No. 16 Middle Eastern Affairs, No. 3,
London, Chatto and Windus 1963,
pp. 90-105

Al-'Alamī, Muḥammad

Za'im al-Rif, Muḥammad bin 'Abd al-Karīm al-Khaṭṭābī, Casablanca,
Dār al-Kitāb, 1968

Amzayyān, Muḥammad
Sallām

'Abd al-Karīm al-Khaṭṭābī, Cairo, Maṭba'a al-Madani, 1391/1971. This book is listed by David Hart in his bibliography (to Aith Waryaghar) although he admits that he has been unable to trace it. It was written by the leader of the revolt against the Moroccan government in the RIF in the late 1950s; and would doubtless be most interesting if it could be found. I have tried, and like Hart failed. It is simply recorded here.

- Ashmead-Bartlett,
Ellis
- Ayache, Germain
- Baedecker, Karl
- Barbour, Neville (ed.)
- Bartels, Albert
- Becerra Fernández,
Manuel
- Berenguer y Fuste,
Dámaso
- Berque, Jacques
- The Passing of the Shereefian Empire,
London, Blackwood, 1910
- "La fonction d'arbitrage du Makhzen" in Actes de Durham Recherches recentes sur le Maroc Moderne, Rabat,
Bulletin Economique et Social du Maroc, 1979, pp. 5-21.
- "Le Sentiment Nationale dans le Maroc du XIXè siècle" in Revue
Historique, vol. 240, 1969, pp.
393-410
- "Les Implications Internationales de la Guerre du Rif 1921-1926" in Héspéris-Tamuda, vol. XV, 1974,
pp. 181-224
- Société Rifaine et Pouvoir Central Marocain" in Revue Historique, vol.
154, 1975, pp. 345-370
- The Mediterranean: Sea Ports and Sea Routes Including Madeira, the Canary Islands, the Coast of Morocco,
Algeria and Tunisia. Handbook for Travellers, Leipzig, London and
New York, 1911
- A Survey of North West Africa,
London, OUP for the Royal Institute for International Affairs, 2nd ed.
1963
- Fighting the French in Morocco, trans. H.J. Stenning, London, Alston Rivers, 1932. The original text appeared in German as Auf Eigene Faust.Meine Erlebnisse vor und während des Weltkrieges in Marokko, Leipzig, 1925
- Notas referentes a la tribu de Kelaia
(Rif) y al ferrocarril de Melilla a las minas de Beni-Buifzur, Madrid,
Artes Gráficas Mateu, 1909
- Campañas en el Rif y Yebala. Notas
y documentos de mi diario de operaciones, Madrid, Sucesores de
R. Velasco, 1923
- Maghreb--Histoires et Sociétés,
Gembloux and Algiers, Duculot and
S.N.E.D., 1974
- "Pousée Nationale et Démocratie à base dans la nation Arabe" in Colloque, pp. 46-49.

- Bidwell, Robin Morocco under Colonial rule--French Administration of Tribal Areas 1912-1956, London, Frank Cass, 1973
- Brennan, Gerald The Spanish Labyrinth, an Account of the Social and Political Background of the Spanish Civil War, Cambridge, Cambridge University Press, 1969
- Brignon, Jean; Amine, Abdelaziz; Boutaleb, Brahim; Martinet, Guy; Rosenburger, Bernard; Terrasse, Michel Histoire du Maroc, Paris and Casablanca, Hatier and Librerie National, 1967
- Brown, Kenneth "Resistance et Nationalisme" in Colloque, pp. 472-477
- al-Bū 'Ayyāshī, Aḥmad Harb al-Rif al Tahriiriya wa marāḥil al-niḍāl, 2 vols. Tangier, Nashr 'Abd al-Salām Gassūs, 1974
- Burke, Edmund, III "Pan-Islam and Moroccan Resistance to French Colonial Penetration 1900-1912" in Journal of African History, vol. 13, 1972, pp. 97-117, referred to in citations as "Pan-Islam"
Prelude to Protectorate in Morocco Pro-Colonial Protest and Resistance 1860-1912, Chicago and London, University of Chicago Press, 1976, referred to in citations as Prelude
- Cab Reb 1913-1927 See Zona de Protectorado Español, in Unpublished Materials
- Capaz Montés, Fernando O. See Unpublished Materials
- Carr, Raymond Spain 1808-1939, Oxford, OUP, 1975
- Cattenoz, H-G. Tables de Concordance des Eres Cretienne et Hégitienne, Rabat Editions Techniques Nord-Africaines, 1961
- Cerdeira, Clemente Apuntes para la historia del Rif, traducción y comentarios de Clemente Cerdeira, Madrid and Ceuta, Editorial Hercules, 1926. This is mainly the translation into Spanish of a lecture given by E. Michaux-Bellaire in French with the addition of many comments by Cerdeira
- Challener, Richard D (ed.) United States Military Intelligence, Vols. 18, 22, 23, 24, New York and London, Garland, 1978, referred to in citations as U.S.M.I.

Charvin, Robert

"Le Parti Communist Français face à la guerre du Rif" in Colloque, pp. 218-261

Colloque

See Anonymous (ed.) Abd el-Krim

Comandancia General de Melilla, Oficina central de Tropas y Asuntos Indígenas

Resumen de la gestión desarrollada bajo la inmediata dirección del excelentísimo Señor Comandante General desde su creación en enero de mil novecientos doce, Melilla, 1915. A work of major importance describing in detail the political activities of the Spanish military administration, referred to in citations as OCTAI, Resumen.

Comisión de Responsabilidades

Documentos relacionados con la información instruida por la llamada 'Comisión de Responsabilidades' acerca del desastre de Annual, Madrid, n.d. The statements of witnesses called to give evidence about the military and political failures leading to the defeats of 1921, referred to in citations as Responsabilidades.

Coon, Carlton S.

Caravan, the Story of the Middle East, New York, Holt, 1958

Tribes of the Rif, Cambridge, Mass., Peabody Museum of Harvard Univ., 1931

Cordero Torres, José María

Organización del protectorado español en Marruecos, 2 vols., Madrid, Editora Nacional, 1942

Danziger, Raphael

Abd al-Qadir and the Algerians, Resistance to the French and Internal Consolidation, New York, Holmes and Meier, 1977

Deny, Jean

"Instructeurs Militaires Turcs en Maroc sous Moulay Hafidh" in Mémorial Henri Basset. Nouvelles Etudes Nord-Africaines et Orientales, Paris Paul Geuthner for L'Institut des Hautes-Etudes Marocaines, 1928, pp. 219-227

Dirección General del Instituto Geográfico y Catastral

Resumen de las Observaciones efectuadas en las Estaciones del Servicio Meteorológico Español, Madrid, Imprenta Ramón Velasco, 1915-1926 (annual publication).

Donoso-Cortés, Ricardo

Estudio Geográfico Político-Militar sobre las Zonas Españolas del Norte y Sur de Marruecos, Madrid, Librería Gutenberg de José Ruiz, 1913

- Drague, Georges
(pseudonym for Spillman, Georges) Esquisse d'Histoire Religieuse du Maroc. Confréries et Zaouias, Paris, Peyronnet, n.d.
- Encyclopaedia Britannica, eleventh ed. Cambridge, 1911
- Encyclopaedia of Islam, new ed. Leiden & London, 1960-78
- España, Ministerio de la Guerra Para los instructores de la Mejasnia Armada, Ceuta, Imprenta Africa, n.d. (c. 1936). A manual for Spanish Officers of Moroccan-manned units in Africa, giving, among other things a list of tribes and their subdivisions, and the area and population of each tribe.
- España, Juan de (pseudonym) La Actuación de España en Marruecos, Madrid, Imprenta de Ramón Velasco, 1926
- Evans-Pritchard, E.E. The Sanusi of Cyrenaica, Oxford, OUP, 1973
- Al-Fasī, 'Allāl Al-ḥarakāt al-istiqlāliya fil-Maghrib al-'arabī, Tangier, Nashr 'Abd al-Salām Gassūs, n.d. A translation of this work, by Nuseibeh, Hazem Zaki, has appeared with the title The Independence Movements of Arab North Africa, New York, Octagon Books, but it is not always accurate and omits certain details. The original has been used in this thesis.
- Fernando de la Hoz, Vincente Apuntes para la Historia de la Imprenta en el Norte de Africa, Tetuan Publicaciones del Instituto General Franco, 1949
- Fleming, Shannon Earl See Unpublished Material
- Fogg, Walter "A Tribal Market in the Spanish Zone of Morocco" in Africa, vol. XI, 1938, pp. 428-458, referred to in citations as "A Tribal Market"
- "Tribal Markets in North-West Morocco" in Africa, vol. XII, 1939, pp. 445-449, referred to in citations as "North-West Morocco"
- Fontaine, Pierre Abd el-Krim, Origine de la Révolution Nord-Africaine, Paris, Sept Colours, 1958
- Forbes, Rosita El Raisuni, Sultan of the Mountains London, Thornton Butterworth, 1924, al-Raisūli's memoirs as dictated to R. Forbes.

- Furneaux, Rupert Abdel Krim, Emir of the Rif, London, Secker and Warburg, 1967
- Gabrielli, Léon Abd-el-Krim et les événements du Rif 1924-1926 notes et souvenirs recueillis et présentés par Roger Coindreau, Casablanca, Editions Atlantides, 1953
- García Figueras, Tomás La Acción de España en Turno al 98 1860-1912, Madrid, Consejo Superior de Investigaciones Científicas, Instituto de Estudios Africanos, 1968
Del Marruecos Feudal. Episodios de la Vida del Cherif Raisuni, Madrid, Barcelona and Buenos Aires, Compañía Ibero-Americana de Publicaciones, 1930
Miscelenea de Estudios Varios Sobre Marruecos, 3 vols., Tetuan, Editora Marroquí, 1953
- García Pérez, Antonio Melilla (Despues de la Campaña de 1909), Madrid, Publicaciones de la Infantería Española, 1911
- Gellner, Ernest & Micaud, Charles (eds.) Arabs and Berbers: From Tribe to Nation in North Africa, London, Duckworth, 1973
- Ghirelli, Anghelo Monografía de la Cabila de Beni Tuzin, Madrid, Gráficas Reunidas, 1923
"Monografía de la Kabila de Bokoia" in Archivos del Instituto de Estudios Africanos de Madrid, Vol. VIII, pt. 32, 1955, pp. 27-83. An account of this tribe's geography, history and sociology, written in 1920, but only published in 1955.
- Gómez de Arteche, José, & Coello, Francisco Descripción y mapas de Marruecos con algunas consideraciones sobre la importancia de la ocupación militar de una parte de este imperio, Madrid, Francisco P. Mellado, 1859
- Gómez-Jordana y Souza, Francisco, Conde de Jordana La Tramoya de nuestra acción en Marruecos, Madrid, Editora Nacional, 1976
- Gordillo Osuna, Manuel Geografía urbana de Ceuta, Madrid, Consejo Superior de Investigaciones Científicas, Instituto de Estudios Africanos, 1972

- Great Britain
Naval Intelligence
Division
- Harris, Walter B.
- Hart, David Montgomery
- Hassan II
- Hernandez Mir,
Francisco
- Hitti, Philip K.
- Hoffman, Bernard G
- Hourani, Albert
- Hubert-Jacques
- Humbaraci, Arslan
- Institut Scientifique
Cherifien, Servic
Météorologique
- Intervención Militar
de Larache
- Intervenciones militares de la región de Melilla, Vademecum 1929, statistics
- Isoart, Paul
- Morocco, 2 vols. 1941-1942 (Geographical Handbook Series), referred to in citations as Great Britain, Morocco
- France, Spain and the Rif, London, Edward Arnold, 1927
- The Aith Waryaghar of the Moroccan Rif, an Ethnography and History, Tucson, University of Arizona Press, 1976, Viking Publications in Anthropology no. 55, referred to in citations as Aith Waryaghar.
- Emilio Blanco Iazaga, Colonel in the Rif, 2 vols. New Haven, Connecticut, Human Relation Area Files 1975, referred to in citations as Blanco Izaga
- "De 'ripublik' à 'république'. Les institutions socio-politiques rifaines et les réformes d'Abd el-Krim" in Colloque, pp. 33-45
- Le Défi, Paris, Albin Michel, 1976
- Del Desastre a la Victoria 1921-1926, 4 vols., Madrid, Librería Fernando Fé, 1926-7
- History of the Arabs from the Earliest: Time to the Present, London, Macmillan, 1970, 10th ed.
- The Structure of Traditional Moroccan Rural Society, The Hague and Paris, Mouton, 1967
- Arabic Thought in the Liberal Age 1798-1939, London, OUP for Royal Institute for International Affairs, 1970
- L'Aventure Riffaine et ses Dessous Politiques, Paris, Bossard, 1927
- Algeria, a Revolution that Failed, a Political History since 1954, London, Pall Mall Press, 1966
- Rélève des Observations climatologiques du Mois, Rabat, 1923-1925 (monthly publication)
- See Unpublished Material
- Intervenciones militares de la región de Melilla, Vademecum 1929, statistics
- "La Guerre du Rif et le parlement français" in Colloque, pp. 173-217

- Jamous, Raymond See Unpublished Material
- Julien,
Charles-André Le Maroc face aux Imperialismes
1415-1956, Paris, Editions Jeune
Afrique, 1978
- Ladreit de
Lacharrière,
Jacques Le Rêve d'Abd el-Krim Esquisse d'Histoire Marocaine, Paris,
J. Peyronnet, 1925
- Lahbabi, Mohamed Le Gouvernement Marocain à l'Aube du Vingtième Siècle, Casablanca, Les Nouvelles Editions Maghrebines, 1975
- Langlet, Alexander Articles in the Manchester Guardian
29 Apr. 1 May, 3 May 1925. Accounts by a Swedish journalist of his visit to the Rif.
- Laroui, Abdallah The History of the Maghrib--or an Interpretive Essay, tr. Ralph
Mannheim, Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1977. A translation of the author's L'Histoire du Maghreb Un Essai de Synthèse,
2 vols. Paris, Maspero, 1976,
referred to in citations as History
Les Origines Sociales et Culturelles du Nationalisme Marocain 1830-1912,
Paris, Maspero, 1977
- Le Tourneau, Roger L'Evolution Politique de l'Afrique du Nord Musulmane, Paris, Armand
Colin, 1961
- Loutskaia, N.S. "A Propos de la Structure Intérieure de la République du Rif" in Trudi
Dvatsatovo Mezhdunarodovo
Kongressa Vostokevodov: Moskva
4-19 Avgust 1960
- Mackenzie, Donald The Khalifate of the West, London, Simpson, Marshall, Hamilton Kent
& Co., 1911.
- Martínez de Campos,
Carlos España Bélica El Siglo XX Marruecos,
Madrid, Aguilar, 1969
- Maurer, Gerald "L'Environnement Géographique Rifain"
in Colloque, pp. 15-24
- Mellor, Capt. F.H. Morocco Awakes, London, Methuen, 1939
- Meteorological Office Tables of Temperature, Relative Humidity and Precipitation for the World Part IV Africa the Atlantic Ocean south of 35°N, and the Indian Ocean, London, HMSO, 1967

- Michaux-Bellaire, E See Cerdeira, C.
- Miège, Jean Louis Le Maroc et l'Europe 1830-1894, 4 vols, Paris, Presses Universitaires de France, 1963
- Mikesell, Marvin W. "Northern Morocco, a Cultural Geography" in University of California Publications in Geography, vol. XIV, 1961
- Milliot, Louis & Wender, Robert "L'Exode saisonnier des Rifains vers l'Algerie" in Bulletin Economique du Maroc, Vol. I, no. 5, July 1934, pp. 313-321, and no. 6, Oct. 1934, pp. 397-402
- Montagne, Robert The Berbers; their Social and Political Organisation, tr. David Seddon, London, Cass, 1973, a translation with comments by Seddon of this author's La Vie Sociale et Politique des Berbères, Paris, Editions du Comité de l'Afrique Française, 1931, referred to in citations as Berbers
- Montagne, Robert Révolution au Maroc, Paris, Editions France-Europe, 1953, referred to in citations as Révolution
See also Unpublished Material
- Morales Lezcano, Víctor El colonialismo hispano-francés en Marruecos 1898-1927, Madrid, Siglo XXI, 1976
- Morsy, Magali "Actualité d'Abd el-Krim" in Colloque, pp. 381-401
- Al-Munjid See Anonymous (ed.)
- Mūsā, Sulaymān "Al-manshūr al-awal li-l-thawra al-'arabiya al-kubrā wa tawzi'uhu fi shamāl Ifriqiya" in Revue d'Histoire Maghrebine, nos. 7-8, June 1977, pp. 106-111 (Arabic section)
- Al-Nāṣirī, Abū 'Abbās Aḥmad b. Khālīd Kitāb al-istiqsā' li-akhbār duwal al-Maghrib al-aqsā, 9 vols, Casablanca, Dār al-Kitāb, 1956
- O.C.T.A.I. See Commandancia General de Melilla
- Oficina Central de Tropas See Unpublished Material
- Parsons, Frederick V. The Origins of the Moroccan Question 1880-1900, London, Duckworth, 1976

- Parsons, Frederick V.
(cont'd) "Late Nineteenth Century Morocco through European Eyes" in Maghreb Review, Vol. III, nos. 5-6, 1978, pp. 1-5
- Payne, Stanley G. A History of Spain and Portugal, 2 vols., Madison, University of Wisconsin Press, 1973
Politics and the Military in Modern Spain, Stanford and Oxford, Stanford University Press and OUP, 1967
- Petrie, Sir Charles King Alfonso XIII and his Age, London, Chapman and Hall, 1963
- Policía Indígena de Melilla, Tercera Mía Memoria Geográfica, Histórica y Estadística de la Kabile de Beni Sicar, Madrid, Talleres del Depósito de la Guerra, 1913, referred to in citations as Policía Indígena, Beni Sicar
- Price, Ward articles in the Daily Mail, 25, 26 28 Apr. and 1 May 1924
- Redhouse, J.W. Redhouse's Turkish Dictionary, 2nd ed. revised by Charles Wells, London, Bernard Quaritch, 1880
- Rodríguez Padilla, Isaias Cofradías Religiosas en el Rif Diversos Taifas de Xorfás Zauías y Santuarios, Ceuta, Imprenta Imperial, 1930
- Roger-Matheiu, J. Mémoires d'Abd el-Krim, Paris, Librairie des Champs Elysées, 1927
- Rosenthal, Erwin I.J. Islam in the Modern National State, Cambridge, Cambridge University Press, 1965
- Ruiz Orsatti, Ricardo La Educación en Marruecos, Tetuán Escuela Hispano-Árabe, 1919
- Saez de Govantes, Luis El Africanismo Español, Madrid, Consejo Superior de Investigaciones Científicas, Instituto de Estudios Africanos, 1971.
- Sa'id, Amin Thawrāt al-'Arab fil-qarn al-'ashrīn, Cairo, Dār al-Hilāl, n.d.
- Sánchez Pérez, Andrés La Acción decisiva contra Abd el-Krim, Toledo, Sebastián Rodríguez, 1930 (Colección Bibliográfica Military Vol. XXVIII)

- Sánchez Pérez, Andrés
(cont'd) "Abd-el-Krim" in Selección de Conferencias y Trabajos Realizados por la Academia de Interventores durante el curso de 1949-1950, Tetuan, Imprenta del Majzen, 1950
- Schacht, Joseph An Introduction to Islamic Law, Oxford, OUP, 1964
- Seddon, David "Le conflit sur la terre à Zaio (Rif Oriental)" in Actes de Durham Recherches Récentes sur le Maroc Moderne, Rabat, Bulletin Economique et Social du Maroc, 1979, pp. 179-197
"Notes on 'Primitive Rebels' in the Precolonial Maghreb" in Maghreb Review, Vol. I, no. 3, 1978, pp. 18-20
See also Unpublished Material
- Shaw, Stanford J. & Shaw, Ezel K. History of the Ottoman Empire and Modern Turkey, 2 vols., Cambridge, London, New York and Melbourne, Cambridge University Press, 1977
- Sheean, Vincent Adventures among the Riffi, London, Allen and Unwin 1926. This book has also been published under the title An American among the Riffi, referred to in citations as Adventures
Personal History, New York, Random House, 1935
- Shinar, Pessah "'Abd al-Qādir and 'Abd al-Krīm, Religious Influences on their Thought and Action", in Asian and African Studies (Israel), Vol. I, 1965, pp. 139-174
- Skiraj See Unpublished Material
- Société de Science Nationale du Maroc Bulletin Météorologique de l'Institut Scientifique Cherifien, Rabat, 1926- (monthly publication)
- Speight, C.M. "Islamic Reform in Morocco" in Muslim World, Vol. LIII, 1963, pp. 41-49
- Spillman, Georges See Drague, Georges
- Statesman's Year Book, Statistical and Historical Annual of the States of the World for the Year 1911, London, Macmillan, 1911

- Stoddard, Lothrop Ḥādir al-ʿĀlim al-Islāmī, tr. 'Ajāj Nūwihad, notes by Shakīb Arslān, Cairo, 1343
- Stuart, Graham H. The International City of Tangier, Stanford, Stanford University Press, 1955
- Toynbee, Arnold J. (ed.) Survey of International Affairs 1925, Vol. I, The Islamic World, Oxford and London, OUP, Royal Institute for International Affairs 1927, pp. 125-163 contain a mainly diplomatic and military account of the Rif war.
- Troin, J.F. "Le Nord-Est du Maroc, Mise on point Régionale" in Revue de Géographie du Maroc, 1967, pp. 5-43
- Usborne, Vice-Admiral C.V. The Conquest of Morocco, London, Stanley Paul, 1936
- Vinogradov, Amal & Waterbury, John "Situations of Contested Legitimacy in Morocco; an Alternative Framework" in Comparative Studies in Society and History, Vol. XIII, no. 1, Jan. 1971, pp. 32-57
- Waterbury, John The Commander of the Faithful, the Moroccan Political Elite--A Study in Segmentary Politics, London, Weidenfeld and Nicholson, 1970
- Wehr, Hans A Dictionary of Modern Written Arabic, ed. J. Milton Cowan, Wiesbaden and London, Otto Harasowitz and Allen and Unwin, 1971
- Woolman, David S. Rebels in the Rif, Abd el Krim and the Rif Rebellion, London and Stanford, OUP and Stanford University Press, 1969
- Yousoufi, Abderrahman "Les Institutions de la République du Rif" in Colloque, pp.81-100
- Zona de Protectorado Español See Unpublished Material

NewspapersDiario Universal, MadridEl Africa, CeutaEl Eco de Tetuán, TetuanEl Noticiero de Tetuán, TetuanEl Telegrama del Rif, MelillaThe Daily Mail, LondonThe Manchester Guardian, ManchesterThe Times, LondonThe Illustrated London News, LondonMaps

Carte du Maroc au 1:100,000 published by Ministère de l'Agriculture du Maroc, Service Topographique, Rabat

Sheets nos	NI - 30 XIX	- 4
		- 3
		- 2
		- 1
	XX	- 2
		- 1
	XXI	- 2
		- 1

Carte du Maroc au 1:500,000 published by the Institut de Géographie National, Paris, 1954, Sheets "Rabat" and "Oujda"

Croquis de la Zona Española al Norte de Marruecos in Donoso-Cortes, op. cit., bound at end of book. 1:500,000

Great Britain, War Office, edition 1-GSGS sheets 420B and 421A (Fes and Oran) 1:500,000

Mapa del Territorio de Melilla Formado con auténticos datos oficiales y noticias personales, para seguir el curso de las operaciones militares. Editado por la Librería Yagües, Madrid, 1921, consulted in B.N.E.S. de A.

Mapa Militar de Marruecos Carta Provisional,

Zona Oriental

Zona Occidental (con datos hasta febrere de 1923)

Both at 1:150,000. Consulted in S.H.M. Published by Cuerpo de Estado Mayor del Ejército

Tribes of Morocco contained in Hoffman, op. cit., bound at end of book

Zona de Protectorado de España en Marruecos, Comunicaciones,
1:500,000 published by Delegación de Obras Públicas y
Comunicaciones, 1950

APPENDIX

The documents reproduced here are a selection of some of the more interesting letters and records referred to in this thesis. It was impossible to reproduce every Arabic document referred to, so the selection is only an illustration of the range of documentation that was available. A number of internal Rifi documents--prison registers, payment sheets and bureaucratic communications are included, as specimens of their types. Each document is transcribed--in so far as they are legible, with the exception of lists of names which are just reproduced in photocopies. Where a translation does not appear in the text, one is attached here.

In dealing with these documents it must be born in mind that they were written not by highly educated faqihs, but for the most part by semi-educated people. The writing and the grammar are consequently not all that might be desired. In some cases they are quite unreadable, even to Moroccan Arabs from the area. Mr. Muḥammad al-Manṣūr, from the Jibāla, has given me great assistance in this matter, but even he found certain expressions impossible to decipher.

Furthermore, the writers had a tendency to abbreviate certain words, particularly titles: thus قائد (qā'id) is rendered قا, and الحاج (al-ḥājj) is rendered ح. The original has been transcribed as accurately as possible. In the case of wild mis-spellings which might lead to confusion, the correct version has been added in brackets.

Document 1

The maḥalla of Tisūttīn to 'Abd al-Qādir bin al-Ḥājj al-Ṭayyib and the tribe of Banū Shikār, translated by Spanish Army 27 July 1921.

Source: SHM Melilla Leg. 18, Información Julio

See above, p. 327.

Tránscription

الحمد لله وحده
 وصلى الله على سيدنا محمد واله
 كافة اخواننا بني شكار منهم الشيخ عبد القادر ولد ج الطيب
 والشيخ محمد ازمانى وكافة اهوانكم (...) كبيرا وصغيرا اسلام عليكم ورحمة
 الله تعالى بركته عن قيد مولانا ايدى الله ونصره وبعد ياخواننا نحبكم
 تكونوا على بال وتقفوا وقوف الجد والاجتهاد الان ساعة الفراح
 المسلمين ولا تظنوا بالاخر شيئا لان ذاتا واحده ونحبكم ياخواننا
 تكونوا على بال واشتداد في باب الجهاد كما قال الله العظيم
 وجهدوا باموالكم وانفسكم الى الاية واما اخوانكم المسلمين
 فلا تضروا احد منهم والكفار دمرهم الله وشتت شملهم اقتلوهم
 واحدلوهم ولا تانوا عليهم حتى فتقطع اثرهم ونعلم نظنوا في بالنا
 بوفق الله ورسوله ملاقتنا ان شاء الله مدينة مليلة وكونوا ذاتا
 واحدا وهذا ما نعلمكم وعلى صحبكم والسلام نحن قاطنين بمحلنا
 السعيدة في تزطوطن
 عن اذن اخوانكم المجهدين قبيلة
 بني وريغل ومن تبعهم من القبائل امهم الله امين

on the reverse:

ليد سيد عبد
 القادر بن ج الطيب
 الشكري امه الله

Translation

Praise be to God alone and God's blessing be on our lord Muḥammad and his family.

To all of our brothers in the Banū Shikār including the Shaykh 'Abd al-Qādir Wuld al-Ḥājj al-Ṭayyib and the Shaykh Muḥammad Azamānī and all your brothers great and small. Peace be upon you and the mercy and blessing of God may he be exalted. [This letter is written] upon the stipulation of our Lord may God help him and make him victorious.

To continue:

Oh our brothers! Be on your guard, be ready to make your stand upright with firmness and diligence for the hour of happiness has arrived for the Muslims. Do not imagine any other path [is open to you] because [Muslims should be] as one person. We wish that you, oh our brothers, should be attentive and passionate in carrying out the jihād. As the great God has said, "Make holy war with your possessions and your bodies and so on." As for your brother Muslims, do not harm a single one of them, but the un believers, may God destroy them and scatter them, them you should kill, them you should flatten into the ground. Do not [hold back from] them until you have removed every trace of them. We know and think in our hearts that, with the agreement of God and his Prophet we shall meet [you], God willing, in the city of Melilla and that you will be as one body. This is what we have to tell you and your companions. And peace.

We are staying in the fortunate maḥalla in Tizṭūṭin [sic].

On the order of your brothers the mujāhidīn of the tribe of Banū Waryaghāl and those who follow them from the other tribes May God protect them. Amen.

On the reverse:

To the Sayyid 'Abd al-Qādir bin al-Ḥājj al-Ṭayyib al-Shukrī. May God protect him.

وعلو الله على سائر الملوك والاد

الجليلة وحكمه

كلية اقدانها في سبب من هو زلفه في انفاذ اولاد في الطيب
والعقبة محمد الزمان وولاية اقدانها في سبب من هو زلفه في الطيب
الله تعالى وسبب من هو زلفه في الطيب الله تعالى وسبب من هو زلفه في الطيب
وهو في اعمالي اوقفتها وقوت الجهد والاعتماد في سبب من هو زلفه في الطيب
في مقاسمها وانما هو في سبب من هو زلفه في الطيب في مقاسمها وانما هو في سبب من هو زلفه في الطيب
تكون اعمالي اوقفتها وقوت الجهد والاعتماد في سبب من هو زلفه في الطيب
وهو في اعمالي اوقفتها وقوت الجهد والاعتماد في سبب من هو زلفه في الطيب
بما تفرق اقدانها في سبب من هو زلفه في الطيب في مقاسمها وانما هو في سبب من هو زلفه في الطيب
في مقاسمها وانما هو في سبب من هو زلفه في الطيب في مقاسمها وانما هو في سبب من هو زلفه في الطيب
وهو في اعمالي اوقفتها وقوت الجهد والاعتماد في سبب من هو زلفه في الطيب
في مقاسمها وانما هو في سبب من هو زلفه في الطيب في مقاسمها وانما هو في سبب من هو زلفه في الطيب
وهو في اعمالي اوقفتها وقوت الجهد والاعتماد في سبب من هو زلفه في الطيب
في مقاسمها وانما هو في سبب من هو زلفه في الطيب في مقاسمها وانما هو في سبب من هو زلفه في الطيب

عما اذ في اقدانها في سبب من هو زلفه في الطيب
في مقاسمها وانما هو في سبب من هو زلفه في الطيب في مقاسمها وانما هو في سبب من هو زلفه في الطيب
وهو في اعمالي اوقفتها وقوت الجهد والاعتماد في سبب من هو زلفه في الطيب
في مقاسمها وانما هو في سبب من هو زلفه في الطيب في مقاسمها وانما هو في سبب من هو زلفه في الطيب

Document 2

Letter from 'Abd al-Mālik bin al-Amīr 'Abd al-Qādir Maḥyī al-Dīn to Muḥammad bin 'Abd al-Karīm.

14 Dhū al-Ḥijja 1339/19 August 1921.

Source: MAEF, Maroc 517, p. 250.

See above, p. 365.

Transcription

الحمد لله وحده صلى الله على سيدنا محمد وآله وصحبه وسلم تسليما
 احبائنا في الله والمجاهدين في سبيله الفقيه السيد محمد بن السيد عبد
 الكريم امنكم الله ورحمكم وسلام عليكم ورحمة الله /
 وبركاته وبعد كتبنا لكم قبل هذا ولم يظهر الجواب ولا المخزني الذي
 ذهب بالكتاب وكنا في انتظار جوابكم /
 واذا به ارسل الينا بعض اعيان ورثة الكتاب التي تصلكم نسخة منه
 طيه فان كان الكتاب حقيقة /
 هو كتابكم ولا نظن ذلك فيكم فما كان هاذنا اجزاء منكم بعد وقوفنا
 هذه المدة الطويلة في /
 باب الجهاد وان كان ليس عندكم بل هو ضرور اعلمونا بذلك لتعلمكم
 الذي ارسله لنا لينا /
 العقوبة الازمة له لاجل توويره على لسان المجاهدين مثل هاذنا الكتاب واعلموا انه لم /
 يصل كتاب منكم لنا ابدا لاجل حركة او غيرها من ورثة وكنا نظن اننا واقفون امام العدو /
 ساعون في جمع القبائل والتاليف بينهم لتكون منهم الفائدة اذا هاجم العدو هاذنا البلاد /
 في يوم من الايام وان عملنا هاذنا يعجب كل مسلم عاقل والان تبين لنا ان
 الامر على خلاف ذلك /
 وقد تمكن اصحاب الفرنسيين من نشر دسائسهم ووقتشويق القبائل للعصيان
 وتفریق هاذنا /
 العمابة الاسلامية كما يفعله ولد الدرقاوي وغيره وانا لله وانا اليه راجعون
 وقد عييت /
 عن معانة امور القبائل الذين لا يفرقوا بين الضر والنفع والحسن ولقبيح ولو /
 وجدت ان اكون منعزلا عن هاذنا الامور كليها لما كرهت في ذلك وتكون
 الراحة لي ولن
 هو مشتغل في سوا من جبالة او من الريف ويظهر لي حينئذ ان
 ارباط في الريف / او في جبالة او غير ذلك نسئل الله ان يفرج عنا
 وعن جميع المسلمين كل الحرب والسلام في 14 (؟) ذي /
 حجة الحرام عام عام 1339
 عبد المالك بن الامير
 عبد القادر محي الدين
 امه الله

Translation

Praise be to God alone. God's blessing be on our Lord Muḥammad his family and companions and his complete peace.

To our beloved in God, the fighters for his faith and the Faqīh Muḥammad bin al-Sayyid 'Abd al-Karīm may God protect you and keep you. Peace be upon you and the Mercy of God and his blessing.

And to continue:

We have written to you before and have received no reply, nor has the makhzanī (i.e., soldier) whom we sent with the letter returned. We have been waiting for your reply. Meanwhile some of the a'yān of the Wargha sent a letter to us, a copy of which we enclose. If this letter is in truth from you--and we do not think that you would do such a thing--then we are not well rewarded by you for the great length of time in which we have carried out holy war. If the letter is not from you then you must tell us, so that we may inform you about who sent it and he may thus receive his necessary punishment for his forgery of the (true) voice of the mujāhidīn of which this letter is an example.

You should know that we have never received any letter from you calling on us to form a ḥarka in the Wargha or for any other reason. We thought we would hold ourselves ready against the enemy, attempting to join the tribes together and to unit them so that they would be of use on the day when the enemy attacked this area. What we have done in this matter has impressed every right-thinking

Muslim, so you should let us know at once if you think we should have done anything different. The supporters of the French have been able to spread their deceptions and arouse the tribes' longing for disobedience, and to break this Islamic federation. One who has done this is the son of al-Darqāwī and others. We (on the other hand) belong to God and to him we shall return. I came to my wits' end (trying to) sort out tribes when they are unable to distinguish between what is and what is not to their advantage, and between what is good and bad. If you think that I should give up all these affairs, because I find it distasteful, (that is) I or anyone else who is active either in the Rif or Jibāla, tell me at once so that I may go to live in the Rif or Jibāla or somewhere else.

We ask God that he may set us and all Muslims free from all war.

And peace.

On 14 (?) Dhū al-Ḥijja al-Ḥarām in the year 1339.

'Abd al-Mālik bin al-Amīr 'Abd al-Qādir Maḥyī al-Dīn, may God protect him.

المزودة رقم ٢٥٠ و هو على سيدنا محمد وآله وصحبه وسلم

٢٥٠

احياءنا في السور والجاهدين في سبيله الغيبه السيرة النبوية السيد عبد الرزاق امين الله ورضي عنه وسام عليكم ورحمة الله
وبركاته وبعث كتيبا لكم قبل هذا اوله بكتفي الجواب والاعتراف الذي كتبت بالكتاب وكذا في انتظار جوابكم
واذا به ارسل اليها بعض اعماله ورجعة الكتاب التي تعلق نسخة منه فيه قبل هذه الكتاب مفيدة
هو كتابكم وكان في ذلك منكم ما كان هذا اجراؤنا منكم بجزء وفوقنا هذا في المطبوعة في
باب الجهاد وانه كتاب ليس من عندكم بل هو من وراء علمونا بذلك لتعلموا بالذي ارسله لنا لبيان
الفرقة اللازمة له للاجل تزويركم على لسان الجاهدين مثل هذا الكتاب واعلموا ان ذلك
يعد كتاب من كتابنا للاجل مرة او غيرهما من ورجعة وكتابتكم انما هي ورفعت افعال العدو
سليمة في جميع القبائل والتدابير يمنع لتكون صنع الجاهدين اذا هاجم العدو في بلاد
يعود مع الايام وان عملنا هذا بعين كل مسلم عاقل والانه تبيي لنا ان الكلام على كتابي الذي
وقد تمكنا انما هو من غير من نشر في سبيلهم وتذكروا القبائل للعصيان وتبوعها هذا
العلانية الاسكمانية كما يعلمه ولد الذرفا وكغيرها اننا له واننا اليه راجعون وقد عيبت
عن مملاتنا امور القبائل الا ان يكون بين الكفر والنعيم والحسد والغيب ولو
رجلنا ان يكون من غير لاعت هذا الامور كلها كرهت في ذلك وتكون الرضا على ولما
هو مشغول به سواء من جباله او من الرعي ويظهر في حينه ان ارايه في الرعي او في
جباله او غير ذلك فكل الله ان يعرج عننا وعن جميع المسلمين على كره والامكان في

حجة الراجح علم علم ١٣٣٥ عبر المالك بن الامير
عبد القادر محرابي
امينه الله

Document 3

Letter "all the a'yān of the Wargha" to 'Abd al-Salām b. al-Ḥabīb al-Fannāssī, 10 Jumāda II 1341/28 January 1923.

Source: SHM Melilla Leg. 22, Cartas Arabes, 2, Marnisa y Wargha.

The translation of this document appears above, p. 488.

Transcription

الحمد لله وحده صلى الله على سيدنا محمد وآله
 حضرة اخينا عبد السلام بن الحبيل الفناسي عليك السلام والرحمة البركة على /
 الدوام وبعد بارك الله فيك على الخدمة الذي فعلته مع قبائل ورغة من /
 الكذب والفجور وكانوا عندهم فيك النية الكبيرة وكنت تقول اصنبيا /
 احسن من جميع الاجناس وذلك نحن لا معرفة لنا بها وهي كذلك انما انت /
 عرفنا حتى سمعت الناس معرفتنا جرت في جميع البلاد وبدلنا للاسلام /
 والخوات مع الريف وحبسنا في اصنبى والكفر وعلنا الفتان ووقع القتال /
 ودخلنا في بلاد بني ورياغل على سبب المساجين اصنبى وقبض الفتاه واليوم رجع /
 عبد الكريم صاحب وصديق وحبيب اصنبى حيث اعلم الصيب في اصنبى حتى سمعوه /
 الهنود ونحن تحمينا معهم جزوه بالفضيحة وضحك القبائل وناد لنا الفرنسيين /
 يعيرنا ويقول لنا هاذة الدولة تعنية بها اليوم جزت ولد الكريم بلا /
 موال بسبب اصنبى علينا على حبيبهم ولد عبد الكريم وجازت قبائل ورغة /
 بذل والهوان هذا حقنا على اصنبى وخيرنا عمل لنا هذا وقبل هذا ضكروا
 (ذكروا) لنا الفرنسيما /
 وبين تركة الدولة المعظمة . . . اصنبى دولة الهون ذلك اليوم عرفنا كلامهم /
 نصاحة لنا وكلامك وكلام اصحابك كذب لنا هذا جزنا وذلك اعلم بانك /
 لا قدم لك في هذه الساعة والسلام في عشرة من جماد الاخر عام احد واربعين /
 ثلاثمائة والف

كافة اعيان ورغة
 امهم الله

وهو الله على سبيلنا محمد وآله

البحر المحيى
= كذا =

حفرة اخينا عبد المسيح بن ارجيب القنادس عليه السلام والرحمة والبرقة على
 الروام وجريلد زلته بيت عم الخرمية الزرية الكلبة مع فبايد ورفعه مسي
 الكثر والعبور وكانوا عشارهم بيت النية الربيق وكنتا تنفوك اخينا
 احسن مع جميع الاجناد والى من لا معرفة لنا به عا وهي كذا انما انت
 عرفتنا عترت من النادر عترتنا بنت في جميع البلاء وبدا لنا السلام
 والخوات مع الترفيع وحبسنا في ارجين والنتبر وعملنا العنان ووقع الفتال
 ولا غلنا في بلاد بني ريبانك على حسب الملكا بين ارجين ونبغ القناه واليوم
 عبد الكرم صاحب وضيعة وحيث ارجين بيت عمك ابيث هو ارجين عترت من
 الهند ونحن قميننا مع جزوه بلا بغيره وكنتم ارجين بل فرال لنا لابن قيس
 جبرنا ويقول لنا انك ارجين بنت ارجين بنت ارجين بنت ارجين بنت ارجين بنت
 موال بنسب ارجين تخرج علينا على جميع ولد ارجين بنت ارجين بنت ارجين بنت
 بنك والهران فنرا حفنا على ارجين وغيرنا عملنا ارجين بنت ارجين بنت ارجين بنت
 ويون ترمية الرواة الملكة ونما عترنا ارجين بنت ارجين بنت ارجين بنت ارجين بنت
 راحة لنا وملاية وملكها بنت ارجين بنت ارجين بنت ارجين بنت ارجين بنت
 لا قروم لنا في ملكها الصاعه والصلح في عترتنا بنت ارجين بنت ارجين بنت وملاية وارجين

سادة ارجين ورفعه
الصلح ارجين

Document 4

The bay'a of Muḥammad bin 'Abd al-Karīm dated 14 Jumāda II
1341/2 February 1923.

Source: MAEF, Maroc 517, p. 180.

The translation of this document appears on pp. 514-518.

Unfortunately, this document is too large to be reproduced as a photograph and remain legible, and would not photocopy because it is of very uneven quality.

Transcription

الحمد لله وحده وصلى الله على سيدنا محمد واله وصحبه الحمد لله الذي نظم
بالخلافة شمل الدين والدنيا . وأعلى قدرها على كل قدر فكانت لها الدرجة العليا
واشرق شمسها في المعالم وانا بنوره /
المعالم واصلح بها امر المعاش المعاد . والف فيها بين قلوب العباد من الحاضر
العباد . وجعلها صونا للذما . والاموال والاعراض رغل بها ادي الجبايرة
فلم نصل الى مفاسد الاغرض /
فقام بها امر الخلق والاستقام . وأقيمت الشرائع والحدود والاحكام . ونصب
منارها علما هاديا . واقامه الى الحق داعيا . فأوى لظلمها الوريث .
القوي والضعيف المشروف والشريف . فسجد /
من قرر نهدي ولم يترد الانسان سدى . بل امره ونهاه وحذره عن اتباع
هواه . وطوقه القيام بالنفل والفرض . وهو احكم الحكيم . ولولا دفع الناس
بعضهم ببعض لفسدت الارض ولانك الله ذو فضل على العالمين /
ومن رحمته نصب الملوك ومهد الطريق للسير والسلوك ولو ترد الانس فوضا .
لاكل بعضهم بعضا . وإل الامر الحزاب انفا . لولا الخلافة لم
تومن لنا سبل وكل . . .
والصلاة والسلام على المبعوث رحمة الله تام اصل الوجود ومبناه
وغاية الكمال ومنتهاه . سيد الاوليا . وقائد الاصفيا
وعلى اله اولي المجد العميم والقدر العظيم . واصحا /
به المرشدين . الاهداء المهتدين شيدوا اركان الدين ومهدوا
قواعده للمشيدين واخبروا عنه واسندوا اليه صلى الله عليه وسلم انه قال
ان الله اختص بهذا الامر قرشيا /
وانزل الله عليه والله يوتي ملكه من بينا . القائل من مات وليس في عنقه بيعة
مات ميتة جاهلية . وفي صحيح مسلم عنه صلى الله عليه وسلم قال من اراد
ان يفرق امر هذه امة /
وهو جميع فاضربوا عنقه بالسيف كائنا من كان . وفي صحيح مسلم عنه صلى الله
عليه وسلم قال من اتاكم وامركم جميع على رجل واحد واراد ان يفرق جماعتكم فاقتلوه /

وفي صحيح البخاري عن ابن عباس رضى الله عنه قال . قال رسول الله صلى الله عليه وسلم من كره من اميره شيئا فليصبر فان من يخرج عن السلطن شبرا مات ميتة جاهلية . وفيه ايضا /

عن ابي هريرة رضى الله عنه قال قال رسول الله صلى الله عليه وسلم من اطاعني فقد اطاع الله ومن عصاني فقد عصى الله ومن اطاع اميري اطاعني ومن عصى اميري فقد عصاني . /

فقال امير المؤمنين عمر ابن الخطاب رضى الله عنه لا بن عقبة لعلك لا تلاقاني بعد اليوم فعليك بتقوي الله تعالى والسمع والطاعة للامير وان عبدا حبشيا . /

واتفق الامة الدين على ان نصب الامام واحد على المسلمين وان كان من فروض الكفاية كما ان القيام بذلك من الواجبات كما دلت عليه نصوص الاحاديث والايات / وقال الشاعر . لما يصلح الناس فوضى لا سراة لهم . ولا سراة اذا جهالهم سادوا . ولما كان قبائل الريف وقبائل الجبال قبل هذا بعامين في غاية من العتو والعيار / وكثرة الجهل والطغيار والعتاد . وعن الشريعة في غاية الانحراف والابعاد . وعظم الظلم بين العباد . حتى تعززت المعاصاة من كان ذا الشوكة في البلاد واستمروا على التعصب /

والقتل والسلب الاموال مع ما من عدوهم من عظيم الفتنة والاهوال . حتى لا ملجا ولا مفر لهم الا ما ياتيهم من قبل الكبير المتعان فلما اعياهم هذا ولا يعلمون دواءه . / طلبوا من يقوم بامرهم على سبيل استتابة . فاجمعوا رأيهم واسندوا امرهم بالهام اليه السماء والارض . الى من احمد فعاله في البسيطة طولها والعرض . فاجابهم / لمغربهم وقام بشئونهم واحالهم اولا على متابعة شريعة الرسول . التي يروى بها كل مامل . بعدما اخذ عليهم في المصحف العقود والوفاء بالمواثيق والعهود . فاس /

. . . عليها . . . بمقتضاها . ثم نظمهم وعلمهم كيفية الحروب والدفاع عن الوطن وكيفية الهجوم على عباد الصليب والوثن . فانتهزوا /

بالفرصة في عدوهم في الحين . فاصبحوا في وقتهم عليه ظهريين ولم يعبثوا بما جاء به واتاهم به من . . . العجيب . ولا منعهم ما تحصن به من الشكل الغريب بل ذهب (وا) (end of line missing)

ذيل كله وصاروا من جملة قول كان . مسجد من باد ذك وهو في ملكه كل يوم في شان . فبتباعة اميرهم هذا ايدى الله عشروا على السعادة . وبامثال اوامره السديدة /

اخذوا في الانتصار المرآية . وفي تمهيدات بلادهم حصلوا على الغاية . مما علم ذك عند القاضي والداني . ولم يجحده وحد من جنس الانساني . ومستكفه مستكف /

لنور النهار . وكيف يصح في الازهان شي . اذا احتاج النهار الى دليل . ثم لما حصل لهم الامان في النفوس والاموال كانوا في غاية نمور والازدياد . / وكثرة الصلاح والنجاح والهناء على احسن المراد . و (. . .) وتلاشى ما ما كان معتادا بينهم في عابر الازمان من الفساد . من القتل والسلب وضروب المحن واخذت في اقطارهم /

جميع نيران الفتن • ونفس الله عنهم الكريات • ونشر رحمته وازاح لغمته • وصارت
القلوب داعمة بعد بؤسها والوجوه ضاحكة بعد عبوسها • والشعور والفتن /
بينهم قد ادبرت • واعلام الامن والعافية قد اقبلت • فوجه الله جيوش المسلمين
للاعمال المرضية • والهمم لما فيه صلاح الدنيا والدين الراع والرعية فاقتضى /
النظر وانعقد الجماع بيعة من في افق السعادة قد طلع • وظهر في سما المعارف
بدره وارتفع • الذي القت اليه الامامة زمامها • وقدمته الافاضل لفضل /
الامامة • من جاء له الخلافة تجر انياله • واخذوا دون اضا • (اضاع) زمانه •
ولم تكـ (من) تصلح الا له ولم يكن يصلح الا لها • ومن جبلت قلوب الخلق
على محبته • والقي له القبول في الاسلام /

لمحده وعلوهمته امير المجاهدين • الواثق بربه المعين سيدنا محمد بن العالم
الفاضل سيدنا عبد الكريم الخطابي الورياغلي الريفى • فبايعوه عزة الله ونصره /
على كتاب الله وسنة الرسول • واقامة العدل الذى هو غاية المامل • بيعة
التزمها القلوب والاسنة • وسعت اليها الاقدام والرؤس خاضعة مذعنة • لا يخرجون
له من الطاعة ولا يخرجون /

عن مهيب الجماعة على ما بويح به مولانا رسول الله صلى الله عليه وسلم والخلفاء
الراشدون من بعده • وعلى سمع والطاعة • فرت بها نواظرهم • وشهدت بذاك على /
صفا • بواطنهم ضواهرهم • واعطوا بها صفقة ايديهم وامضوها امضا يدينوا بها في السر
والجهر والمنشط والمكره واليسر والعسر اشهدوا على انفسهم عالم الطويات /
والمطلع على جميع الخفيات • قائلين اننا بايعناك وخلدناك لتسيرنا بالعدل
والمرفق • والوفاء بالصدق • وتحكم بيننا بالحق كما قال تعالى لنبيه في حكم
وحيه • • • • انا /

جعلنا خليفة في الارض فاحكم بين الناس بالحق • وقال تعالى وقوله الحق ومن اوفى بما
عهد عليه الله فسنوته اجرا عظيما • وقال تعالى ولا تكن للخائنين خصيما • اجمع عليه
• • • العقيد /

والحل • واصحاب الكلام فيما قل وجل • ومن يوصف بعلم وقضا • ومن يرجع اليه في
رد وامضا • ولم يخالف فيها امام مسجد ولا خطيب ولا ذوقتوى يسئل فيجيب • لا من يجتهد /

في رأي فيخطي • ويصيب • ولا معروف بدين وصلاح • ولا فرسان حرب وكفاح •
ولا ولاة الامر والحكام • ولا اعيان السادات الاشراف • ولا اكبر الفقهاء • ومن الخفض
قدره ومن اتاق /

شهد بذك الحاضرون على انفسهم طوعا • وادوا الله تعالى مواجب عليهم شرعا •
وجعلها الله رحمة على الخلق • واقام بها في البسيطة العدل والحق وايد بعونه
وتاييده • وتوفيقه وتسديده /

من تلقاها بالقبول • واحيا به لسنة سيدنا وهولانا الرسول صلى الله وسلم شرف وكرم •
فهنيا لارضنا ان القت مقايدها • الى من يحمي حماها • ويحقق دماها • ويكبت /
عداها ويدفع رداها • وينصر الشريعة بشيد مبناه • نصره الله ونصر به وامات البدع
والضلالة بسببه • ودمر به شيعة الجور والكفر والفساد • وابقى الخلافة /
في بيته الى يوم التاد انك يا مولانا بذك قدير • وانت نعم المولى ونعم

النصير . ولا حول ولا قوة الا بالله العلي الكبير . صلى الله على سيدنا محمد
وعلى اله وصحبه وسلم تسليما وَاخرا /

دوانا ان الحمد لله رب العلمين كتبه في كمال بدر 4 جمادى II عام 1341

عبد ربه محمد بن علي الغماري الريفى وفقه الله

وعبد ربه علي بن الحاج محمد الحزمري وفقه الله

بلقاسم بن عبد القادر الفجيجي الحسني الله وليه

وعبد ربه بن الحاج عبد الرحمان اليعقوبي

محمد بن الحاج المالح وفقه الله

شعيب بن ميمون ابن علال الوزاني الولشكي

محمد بن محادين التسماني

؟؟؟؟؟؟

؟؟؟؟؟؟

؟؟؟؟؟؟

Document 5

Announcement of majlis al-'umma not to accept nomination of Minister of Justice, 27 Jumāda II 1341/15 January 1923.

Source: MAEF, Maroc 520, p. 34.

This document is translated in chapter IX, p. 529.

Transcription

الحمد لله وحده لما وقعت المناظرة والمشاورة في مجلس الامة ونشر مقالة /
 للسيد محمد بن علي الذي هو رأس المثاني قائلًا هن الذي يتولى مناظرة /
 العدالة هو الفقيه العلامة سيدي محمد الشمس فاجابوا كلهم بعدم /
 قبوله وحتما على الواضع شيكته بالاشهاد على عدم قبوله لتتشر /
 شهادتنا امام الامير الاعظم ادام الله عزه ونصره وفي سبعة وعشرين /
 من جمادى الاولى عام واحد واربعين وثلاثماية والفاعد ربه /

شعيب بن احمد
 الحطلطي امين

Document 6

Letter of nomination of Aḥmad al-Wajdirī as qāḍī of Raba'a al-Fawqānī, signed by Muḥammad bin al-Ṣāliḥ.

Source: MAEF, Maroc 519, p. 185

See above, p. 530.

Transcription

سيدي
 قياماً بواجب حفظ الحقوق ونظراً لاهمية القسم العدلي /
 في هاته البلاد . ناظر العدلية الواضع شكله اسفله يري من /
 الاثق تعين الفقيه الارضى سيدي احمد الوجديري التسماني قاضيا /
 بالريع الفوقاني بتسمان هذا ما اتشرف بعرضه على جلالتم /
 والسلام 23 رمضان عام 1342 محمد بن الصالح
 لطفه الله

Translation

My Lord,

In accordance with the duty to maintain the laws, and in consideration of the importance of the department of justice in this country, the Minister of Justice whose signature appears below, considers it fitting that the excellent Faḡīh Sidī Aḥmad al-Wajdirī al-Timsamānī should be appointed qāḍī in the Raba' al-Fawqānī in Timsamān. It is this that I have the honour to lay before your highness. And peace.

23 Ramaḡān 19342

Muḥammad bin al-Ṣāliḥ, may God be kind to him.

فيما جردت حجة الحضور ونظر الاصبية انفسهم الى
 في هامة البلاد. فلحق الصرية الوارث نكلا السليم يري ما
 الابه تعيب البقية الارضى يرا عبد الوجيد التمسلا فلما
 بلان مع الوفاة بنسبهم هذا ما اقرت به بعرض على بلان
 والسلاحي 2 رمضان عام 1342 في ايجز راجع هذه الرتبة

بسم

Décision du Ministre de la Justice et de l'Éq. 6, Salah nommant Lidi Ahmed El Agouzi en qualité de cadi du Robou Bouqanü des Temsamane

23 Ramadan 1342
 (17 April 1924)

Document 7

Unsigned letter of appointment issued by the maḥakma of al-Muzimma dated 29 Jumāda II 1342/6 February 1924.

Source: MAEF, Maroc 519, p. 196.

The translation appears in Chapter IX, pp. 530-531.

Transcription

الحمد لله وحده
وصلى الله على سيدنا محمد وآله

محكمة المزمة

يعلم من كتابنا هذا اسماء الله واعز امره اننا بحول الله وقوته عينا
الفاضل الامجد محمد بن عمر العمراني اميننا من امنائنا بورقة
والواقف عليه يعمل بمقتضاه ولا يتعداه والسلام في 29 جمادى 2 1342

1111 الجملية حون حكمة الزمنة وصلى الله على سيدنا محمد وآله

يعلم من كتابنا هذا السما، الله واعز امه اننا يجوز الله وفوته عيتمنا
البلاضل لا يجوز السير بحري عمر العراة اميننا من امننا بينا بورغنت
والنوافع عليه يعمل بمقتضا، ولا يتعرا، والسك، وجملة رعا، 1342

Document 8

List of artillerymen and payments:

15 Muḥarram 1341/7 September 1922

3 Şafar 1341/25 September 1922

6 Şafar 1341/28 September 1922

7 Şafar 1341/29 September 1922

Source: MAEF, Maroc 519, pp. 81-82.

مركز تجميع بنته وليشك السماء كجمعية

تاريخ	مبلغ	اسم	ملاحظات
1341	75000	سید البرهان محمد وعزیز	بسیطه
12.50	75000	انصار بن عبد الله ولفاض
25000	75000	عبدین بن الربیع محمد بن سنان
12.50	75000	احمد بن محمد بن عبد الله ولفاض

اخذت من المكنة 15 اعم 1341

تاريخ	مبلغ	اسم	ملاحظات
1341	75000	سید زینب بن محمد وعزیز	بسیطه
25000	75000	عمر بن یحییٰ وعزیز
25000	75000	مزین بن شعیب وعزیز
25000	75000	عمر وعزیز

السماء كجمعية مركز ازركون بنت وليشك. اخذت من المكنة 15 اعم 1341

تاريخ	مبلغ	اسم	ملاحظات
1341	200000	انصار بن عبد الله	بسیطه
	75000	احمد بن عبد الله
	75000	محمد بن سلام
	75000	عبد بن سعد
	75000	محمد بن عبد الله
	25000	محمد بن عبد الله
	25000	محمد بن عبد الله
	75000	عبد السلام
	25000	محمد بن عبد الله
	75000	محمد بن عبد الله
	25000	محمد بن عبد الله

اسماء كجيجة مركز الناظر بنه و ليشك .

اخذ امار الكومة بـ 15 عمر 1011 ثم اخذ اماره ك صبر اولي 1041

11.65	75.00	20	علو نرس من شعيب بر علي و عزيز
11.65	75.00	21	بنه محماد بر البشير محم و لفلان
11.61	75.00	22	محمور عيسى التمسنته
11.65	75.00	23	علو نرس عيسى التمسنته
11.65	75.00	24	عيسى من شعيب بر علي و عزيز
11.65	25.00	25	مسعود بن محمور احمد و عزيز
	x 75.00		x محمور اضر اس و عزيز

احد .

اسماء كجيجة مركز شليق بنه و ليشك

اخذ امار الكومة بـ 15 العمر اولي 1041 ثم اخذ اماره ك صبر اولي 1041

75.00	26	عبر السيلع	ايت مسعود بيخته
75.00	27	محمور شعيب بر السام محمور التمسنته
75.00 - 25.00	28	محمور عبر العزيز	"
75.00	29	محمور عمر الجوم	"
25.00	30	محمور عمر بن السام	ايت مسعود
75.00	31	احمور عبر الله	"

Document 9

Sadīq b. al-Shadlī to Maḥammad bin 'Abd al-Karīm, .

21 Ramaḍān 1342/28 April 1924.

Source: MAEF, Maroc 520, p. 109

See above, p. 557.

Transcription

الحمد لله وحده وصلى الله على سيدنا محمد واله /
 جلالة سيدنا الخليفة الاسعد البار بالمصالح الامور /
 الاسلامية والدائر عن الوطن البطل المغوار سيدي محمد /
 بن سيدي عبد الكريم رفع الله قدركم وابد سعدكم ومجدكم وسلام على
 جنابكم الرفيع ورحمة الله عن خير مولانا المويد بالله وبعد /
 وصل عندنا للمحكمة محمد بن المكي الوزاني وطلب منا الكتابة /
 لجلالتكم لاجل امور صالح الطريق الكلف بها وهو /
 يريد المتر (المتر) والميزان وستة مطات (؟) وعشرون من البلاط /
 وعشرون من الايات زيادة على ما تحته يريد حوائج المخزن /
 الشريف لان الطريق في بقية صعبة (؟) فيما كثرة الحجر ولولا ما /
 الحوائج المذكورين فلا يمكن التعجل بالطريق كما يزعم سيدنا /
 وايضا يريد البنتورة البيضاء والكحلاء يريد ان يكتب /
 باحرف كبيرة على كل ادارة كباب محكمة المزنة وادارة /
 سيدنا وخليفته وادارة ناظر الحربية الى اخر الحاصل (؟) والحاصل /
 لا بد من تموين ما ذكرناه لجلالتكم على تامه ودمتم /
 بخير والسلام في 21 رمضان عام 1342 /
 سديق بن الشدلي امه الله

and written lengthways on the left side:

ونجروا من جلالتم ان تعلمنا يوم تمام تاسيس /
 محكمة المزنة بعني تاريخها

جانبكم الرفيع ورحمة الله عن خير مولانا المويد بالله بعده /

There are a number of dialect words or words of uncertain origin which need to be explained. For some reason the writer seems to have used ث for ت in the word متر (a ruler). This makes it probable that the word الايات is in fact الايات, پلات is a Moroccanisation (in the plural) of the French word "pelle" meaning "shovel". The same process has happened with the Spanish word "pintura" (paint) which is rendered بنتورة here.

Translation

Praise be to God alone and God's mercy be on our Lord Muḥammad and his family.

His majesty our Lord the khalifa the most fortunate, the man who devotes himself to the affairs of the Muslims, who directs (our) heroic and audacious country, Sidi Maḥammad bin Sidi 'Abd al-Karīm al-Khaṭṭābī may God increase his power and make eternal his happiness and glory. Peace be upon your exalted person and the mercy of God be upon our worthy lord the beloved of God. And to continue.

Muḥammad bin al-Makkī al-Wazzānī came to us in the maḥakma and asked us to write to your majesty about matters (connected with) the repair of roads for which he is responsible. He wants a ruler and a set of scales and six (explosive charges?--illegible) and twenty shovels and twenty machines (?--illegible) in addition to the tools belonging to the noble makhzan which he already has, because the road in the Buqquya is very difficult with many stones in it. Unless he receives the above mentioned equipment it will be impossible to set the road to rights quickly as our lord has ordered. Also, he wants paint, both black and white. He wants to write in big letters on (the door of) each office like the door of the maḥakma of al-Muzimma and the office of our lord and his khalifa and the office of the Minister for War, etc. In short, you must supply everything that we have mentioned. May you stay well. And peace.

21 Ramaḡān 1342, Ṣadiq b. al-Shadlī, may God protect him.

(written on left hand side)

We ask your majesty to inform us of the exact day on which the maḥakma of al-Muzimma is set up, that is to say, the date.

Document 10

Declarations of witnesses and condemnation to death,

25 Sha'bān 1344/10 March 1926.

Source: MAEF, Maroc 519, p. 45 (writing on both sides of the paper.

See above, p. 568.

Transcription (obverse)

الحمد لله اقر واعترف واشهد على نفسه احمد بن علي بن عمر السبع المشروان /
السلامة لدى شهيديه انه اتفق هو رفيقه محمد بن حم مفتاح العاش البشبت /
ورقية بنت احمد بن عمر الحجر الونجل على قتل زوجها عمر بن احمد بن عمر الحجر /
الونجل انهم دخلوا عليه لداره وذبواه الاول احمد وزوجته رقية المذكورة قبضت معه /
بمديّة الثان محمد وهو واقف في الباب وتركوه ميتا لا روح فيه ولا . . . من غير /
شبهة بينهم ولا من حطام الدنيا ولا غيرها انما ذلك لياخذ زوجته المذكور فمن /
سمع الاقرار المذكور طائع لا مكروه قيد بذلك شهادتهم ما سؤلت منهم في خامس عشر
من شعبان الابرار عام اربعة واربعين وثلاثمائة والالف عبد ربه . . .

الحمد لله انكر الثان اعلاه محمد بن حم البشبت انه اقر ما قصد الا الزوجة ليفعل /
معها فعلا لم يرضى به الله ورسوله واما الموت لا علم له ولا المديّة بها ذبحه /
فهي له واما الزوجة المذكورة اعلاه . . . قالت واشهد على نفسها انه دخل /
وقبضها وشد لها على فمها ليلا تتجج وتصرخ فمن سمع منهم ما ذكروا فيه ما /
سمع منهم وفي التاريخ اعلاه عبد ربه

(reverse)

الحمد لله وحده حيث ثبت اقرار احمد بن اعلي المذكور حوله سفك دم اخيه
المسلم المهاجر في سبيل الله /
اعمار بن احمد الونجلي وهو معصوم الدم فان الله تعالى حرم قتل المومن والمعاهد /
بغير الحق فان القتل ابطال المقصود بقصد الموجود وشرع قتل القاتل جزا عن القتل /
فكان في القتل قصاصا تقليل التتل وهو منهم قوله تعالى ولكم في القصاص حيوية /
يا ولي الباب . . . لعلمكم تقوت وشرع قتل الكافر المحارب لان في قتله /
رفع ضرر عن المسلمين وعليه ثبت اثر القتل عليه بان كسوته الجبة /
والقميص عليه الدم فللام ان يقتص منه قال صاحب التفحة /
او يقتل معه قد وجدا من اثر القتل عليه فد بدا . . . وبقاراه ايضا فقال /
قتله لاجل ان ناخذ زوجته ونذهب بها الى بلاد الكفار فنزوجها فعلمنا /
هذا لا عفو في القتال لان تفل اخاه المهاجر بالغيلة فاخبر بان /

عفو قرابة القتل كلا وبعضا لا يغني ولا يحدى في قتل الغيلة المحرابة /
 لان القتل فيها حد من حدود الله لا يحوز لا اسقاطا قال الجزولي ما نصه
 وحقيقة الغيلة هو القدر وهي ان قتله على مال او على زوجة /
 وقال الزرقاني هي القتل بالحيلة قال في رسالته وقتل الغيلة /
 لا عفو فيه قال الجزولي لا للمقتول ولا للولياء ولا للامام لان الحق /
 فيه لله تعالى وفي هذا القدر كفاية والله تعالى اعلم واحكم من غيره /
 وكتبنا بالتقليق وعدم المطالبة لتعذر الكتب
 محمد بن عمر المضاري
 امه الله

Translation

Praise be to God.

Aḥmad bin 'Alī bin 'Umar al-Saba'i al-Mashrawānī of the (Banū) Bū Salāma declared and admitted and bore witness against himself in front of two witnesses that he made an agreement with his companion Muḥammad bin Ḥammu Muftāḥ al-'Ayyāshī al-Bashbatī and Ruqīya bint Aḥmad bin 'Amar al-Ḥajar al-Wanjālī to kill her husband 'Amar bin Aḥmad bin 'Amar al-Ḥajar al-Wanjālī. They entered his house and the first man Aḥmad and the wife Ruqīya already mentioned stabbed him. He was caught with the knife of the second man, Muḥammad, in his possession. The latter was standing at the door. They left him (i.e, the husband) with no breath or life in him. There can be no doubt about their (responsibility). The crime was not done for the trappings of this world or for any other reason except that he should take his said wife.. Those who heard the said declaration (affirm that it was given) willingly and not through coercion.
 Their testimony to this effect was recorded without it being demanded from them. On 15 of blessed Sha'ban in the year 1344. The servant of his God (two illegible signatures follow).

Below

Praise be to God. The second man mentioned above, Muḥammad bin Ḥammu al-Bashbatī denied that he intended anything except to do something with the wife which was displeasing to God and his Prophet. As for the murder he knew nothing, nor did he know anything about the knife with which he was stabbed. But it was his (knife). The above mentioned wife said and herself bore witness that he (the murderer) came in and captured her and he gagged her mouth at night and she screamed and cried. And those who heard what each of them said recorded what they had said on the date given above.

The servant of his God (two illegible signatures follow).

On the reverse of the sheet

Praise be to God alone. The declaration of Aḥmad bin 'Alī the above mentioned has been proved. He is responsible for shedding the blood of his brother Muslim who has emigrated in the cause of God, 'Amar bin Aḥmad al-Wanjali who was protected from the law of blood feud because God, may he be exalted, forbade the killing of a man who has made a covenant, a believer without cause. Indeed killing is the ruination of what was intended to be the aim of creation, and He ordained that the killer should be killed, as a discouragement to murder, so that killing (a murderer) should be a punishment that reduces (the number) of murders. He forbade it saying, may He be exalted, You will find life through this punishment, Oh keeper of the gate . . . (illegible) perhaps you will be strong. He ordained the killing of unbelievers who were fighting (Muslims) because killing them is the removal of a threat to the Muslims.

Traces of the murder were found on him in that his outer garment and shirt had blood on it. The Imām must therefore punish him. The author of the Tufḥa says . A murder (may be proved) by finding the culprit with the marks of the killing clearly upon him, and also by his own declaration. And he said "I killed him so that I might take his wife and go with her to the city of unbelievers and marry her." Knowing this there can be no pardon for the killing, because he assassinated his brother Muslim (literally, "exile in God's cause"). It was announced that the pardon of the relatives of the dead man, all of them or some of them, is not valid or of any use valid in a case of assassination and fighting because the death penalty for it is one of the laws of God which may not be set aside. Al-Jazūlī said "the definition of assassination is that it should be treacherous and be done for money or a wife." Al-Zarqānī said "It is killing by subterfuge." He said in his Risāla, There is no pardon for assassination. Al-Jazūlī said "It [i.e, pardon] is not a matter for the man who has been attacked nor for the saints, nor for the Imām, but is the prerogative of God, may he be exalted.

That is enough of this enumeration. And God, may he be exalted, is wiser and more just than anyone else.

We have written this in disturbed circumstances and without being able to consult (legal) sources because of the difficulty of obtaining books.

Muḥammad b. 'Amar al-Miḍārī May God protect him.

Amen.

Document 11

Letter from Muḥammad b. Mimūn al-Timmittī al-Sa'īdī to Maḥammad bin 'Abd al-Karīm, 5 Rajab 1342/11 February 1924.

Source: MAEF, Maroc 519, p. 47.

The translation of this document appears in Chapter IX,
p. 573.

Transcription

الحمد لله وحده صلى الله سيدنا ومولانا محمد وآله وصحبه وسلم /
 ادام الله وجود مولانا المنصور بالله سيدنا محمد بن عبد الكريم /
 الخطابى سلام عليك ورحمت الله وبركاته اما بعد سيدي /
 لعلمك ان حد برك التميمي القاطن باشانا فانه اخرج /
 بالتحقيق فانه يقدم لاحد بن سيدى حد ويلاقه مع محمد /
 بن عمر اشن لغنه الله ويخبره بجميع احوال هذه الناحية /
 وقد اخبره بالطيارة الوجودية عند سيدنا ووصفها له كونها /
 بيضا ويخبره بجميع احوال هذه النواحي فانه جاسوس /
 بالتحقيق فانه اصابه شيء فعلى رقبته لا على رقبته واحد /
 وبه الاعلام لجانب سيدنا والسلام في 5 رجب الفرد عام 1342 /
 قاً محمد بن ميمون التميمي
 السعيدي وفقه الله

15
47
المتروك I وذل الله عما سبنا من غير الله وحبه

ادع الله وجود مولا النصور بالله سترنا محمد بن عبد الكريم
الغياض اسلام عليه ورحمت الله وكم كانه اما بعرضه ولبه
لعلك ان حيرت من القاصي بالكلية ما انما انما
بالنفس ما انما نفس ولا غير من غير الله فمع
من غير الله ورحمت الله ورحمت الله ورحمت الله
وغيره من غير الله ورحمت الله ورحمت الله ورحمت الله
بمفاه ورحمت الله ورحمت الله ورحمت الله ورحمت الله
بالنفس ما انما نفس ولا غير من غير الله فمع
وغيره من غير الله ورحمت الله ورحمت الله ورحمت الله المتروك
السعي وحب

Document 12

List of prisoners held at Ajdir on 27 Ramaḍān 1342/4 May 1924.

Source: MAEF, Maroc 519, p. 146.

ردیف	شرح	مبلغ	تاریخ	شرح	مبلغ
1	100	12	1004	الذیفر صادر بمرتب	12
2	101	11	1005	قبره و آینه در راه ای تبرکست قنوه و قنوه در جرم اخوانه سانیس - غیر اذنه کورست	11
3	102	25	1006	اشرفه هم مستخدم بالجهاد صبیه	25
4	103	3	1007	الذیفر صادر بمرتب آینه ای تبرکست قنوه و قنوه در جرم اخوانه سانیس - غیر اذنه کورست	3
5	104	11	1008	ایستاد بروج اندویم " مستخدم بالجهاد صبیه بزمامه الی القنوه	11
6	105	1	1009	الذیفر شعب جوزیه الی القنوه و القنوه مستخدم بالجهاد صبیه	1
7	106	2	1010	شعبه مستخدم قنوه و قنوه در راه ای تبرکست قنوه و قنوه در جرم اخوانه سانیس - غیر اذنه کورست	2
8	107	1	1011	القنوه مستخدم قنوه و قنوه در راه ای تبرکست قنوه و قنوه در جرم اخوانه سانیس - غیر اذنه کورست	1
9	108	18	1012	قنوه و قنوه در راه ای تبرکست قنوه و قنوه در جرم اخوانه سانیس - غیر اذنه کورست	18
10	109	23	1013	قنوه و قنوه در راه ای تبرکست قنوه و قنوه در جرم اخوانه سانیس - غیر اذنه کورست	23
11	110	27	1014	قنوه و قنوه در راه ای تبرکست قنوه و قنوه در جرم اخوانه سانیس - غیر اذنه کورست	27
12	111	22	1015	قنوه و قنوه در راه ای تبرکست قنوه و قنوه در جرم اخوانه سانیس - غیر اذنه کورست	22
13	112	6	1016	قنوه و قنوه در راه ای تبرکست قنوه و قنوه در جرم اخوانه سانیس - غیر اذنه کورست	6
14	113	11	1017	قنوه و قنوه در راه ای تبرکست قنوه و قنوه در جرم اخوانه سانیس - غیر اذنه کورست	11
15	114	3	1018	قنوه و قنوه در راه ای تبرکست قنوه و قنوه در جرم اخوانه سانیس - غیر اذنه کورست	3
16	115	14	1019	قنوه و قنوه در راه ای تبرکست قنوه و قنوه در جرم اخوانه سانیس - غیر اذنه کورست	14
17	116	3	1020	قنوه و قنوه در راه ای تبرکست قنوه و قنوه در جرم اخوانه سانیس - غیر اذنه کورست	3
18	117	11	1021	قنوه و قنوه در راه ای تبرکست قنوه و قنوه در جرم اخوانه سانیس - غیر اذنه کورست	11
19	118	3	1022	قنوه و قنوه در راه ای تبرکست قنوه و قنوه در جرم اخوانه سانیس - غیر اذنه کورست	3
20	119	11	1023	قنوه و قنوه در راه ای تبرکست قنوه و قنوه در جرم اخوانه سانیس - غیر اذنه کورست	11
21	120	3	1024	قنوه و قنوه در راه ای تبرکست قنوه و قنوه در جرم اخوانه سانیس - غیر اذنه کورست	3
22	121	27	1025	قنوه و قنوه در راه ای تبرکست قنوه و قنوه در جرم اخوانه سانیس - غیر اذنه کورست	27
23	122	11	1026	قنوه و قنوه در راه ای تبرکست قنوه و قنوه در جرم اخوانه سانیس - غیر اذنه کورست	11
24	123	7	1027	قنوه و قنوه در راه ای تبرکست قنوه و قنوه در جرم اخوانه سانیس - غیر اذنه کورست	7
25	124	12	1028	قنوه و قنوه در راه ای تبرکست قنوه و قنوه در جرم اخوانه سانیس - غیر اذنه کورست	12
26	125	8	1029	قنوه و قنوه در راه ای تبرکست قنوه و قنوه در جرم اخوانه سانیس - غیر اذنه کورست	8
27	126	16	1030	قنوه و قنوه در راه ای تبرکست قنوه و قنوه در جرم اخوانه سانیس - غیر اذنه کورست	16
28	127	1	1031	قنوه و قنوه در راه ای تبرکست قنوه و قنوه در جرم اخوانه سانیس - غیر اذنه کورست	1
29	128	11	1032	قنوه و قنوه در راه ای تبرکست قنوه و قنوه در جرم اخوانه سانیس - غیر اذنه کورست	11
30	129	11	1033	قنوه و قنوه در راه ای تبرکست قنوه و قنوه در جرم اخوانه سانیس - غیر اذنه کورست	11
31	130	3	1034	قنوه و قنوه در راه ای تبرکست قنوه و قنوه در جرم اخوانه سانیس - غیر اذنه کورست	3
32	131	11	1035	قنوه و قنوه در راه ای تبرکست قنوه و قنوه در جرم اخوانه سانیس - غیر اذنه کورست	11
33	132	20	1036	قنوه و قنوه در راه ای تبرکست قنوه و قنوه در جرم اخوانه سانیس - غیر اذنه کورست	20
34	133	2	1037	قنوه و قنوه در راه ای تبرکست قنوه و قنوه در جرم اخوانه سانیس - غیر اذنه کورست	2
35	134	7	1038	قنوه و قنوه در راه ای تبرکست قنوه و قنوه در جرم اخوانه سانیس - غیر اذنه کورست	7
36	135	4	1039	قنوه و قنوه در راه ای تبرکست قنوه و قنوه در جرم اخوانه سانیس - غیر اذنه کورست	4
37	136	4	1040	قنوه و قنوه در راه ای تبرکست قنوه و قنوه در جرم اخوانه سانیس - غیر اذنه کورست	4
38	137	6	1041	قنوه و قنوه در راه ای تبرکست قنوه و قنوه در جرم اخوانه سانیس - غیر اذنه کورست	6
39	138	2	1042	قنوه و قنوه در راه ای تبرکست قنوه و قنوه در جرم اخوانه سانیس - غیر اذنه کورست	2

1004/1005

مبلغ و تاریخ

Document 13

Sa'id bin al-Qā'id al-Sharīf to Muḥammad bin 'Abd al-Karīm,
6 Rajab 1344/20 January 1926.

Source: MAEF, Maroc 519, p. 134.

See above, p. 805.

Transcription

الحمد لله وحده
 وصلى على سيدنا محمد وآله
 في 6 من رجب عام 1344
 جلالة سيدنا محمد بن سيدى عبد التريم دام علاه ومجده وفخره ومأموره /
 السلام عليك ورحمته تعبك وتشمل جانبك واخصب بمنه وكرمه روض مرعاك / وبعد فلا علام لسيدنا .
 . . . امي تخدم في مخبز المخزن الشريف . . . وطلب اجرتها ما وجب لها في /
 ثلاثة اشهر والسلام
 خادم المخزن السعيد
 بن قأ الشريف

Translation

Praise be to God alone and God's blessing bon on our lord Muḥammad and his family.

6 Rajab 1344

To His majesty our lord Muḥammad ibn Sidi 'Abd al-Karīm.

May his rank and glory and honour and authority be prolonged.

Peace be upon you and (God's) mercy embrace you and cover your person, and may he make the meadows of your pastures fertile with his blessing and generosity.

To continue: This is to inform our Lord of the following.

My mother has worked in the bakery of the honourable makhzan (following word unclear) and she requests the pay that is owing to her for three months.

And peace.

The servant of the makhzan, Sa'id bin al-Qā'id al-Sharīf.

وصلى الله على سيدنا محمد وآله

١٥

الخمسة وحده

١٥٦٤ رجب عام ١٣٩٩

بلائة سيرنا ^{١٥} بقدر ابن سير عبر الربيع لام علاء وبقدره وبقدره
 السلاع عليه در جفت نعمة وتنهل جانك واغلب بهند وكي قد روضه مر علاء
 وبعد بلا السلاع لسيدونا
 هاتين اتي تخم وخبز الميزن التبريد للمعينة ونطلب اجرتك ملوحب لها
 فلانة اشهر والسلاع

اجتهدت في
 كتابه في
 وكتبه و
 في سنة ١٣٩٩

خارج الميزن السعيد
 بقدره

والله بعد بفتح على جو

٧